THE HAPPY HOME.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

I love the hearth where evening brings
Her loved ones from their daily tasks;
Where Virtue spreads her spotless wings,
And Vice—fell serpent! never basks!
Where sweetly rings upon the ear
The blooming daughter's gentle song,
Like heavenly music whispering near,
While thrilling hearts the notes prolong,

For there the father sits in joy,
And there the cheerful mother smiles;
And there the laughter-loving boy,
With sportive tricks the eve beguiles;
And love beyond what worldings know,
Like sunlit on the purest foam,
Descends, and with its cheering glow,
Lights up the Christian's happy home.

Contentment spreads her holy calm
Around a resting place so bright;
And gloomy sorrow finds a balm,
In gazing at so fair a sight;
The world's cold selfishness departs,
And discord rears it front no more;
There pity's pearly tear-drop starts,
And charity attends the door.

Oft have I joined the lovely ones
Around the bright and cheerful hearth,
With father, mother, daughter, sons—
The brightest jewels of the earth;
And while the earth grew dark around,
And fashion called her senseless throng,
I've fancied it was holy ground,
And that fair girl's a seraph's song.

And swift as circles fade away
Upon the bosom of the deep,
When pebbles tossed by boys at play,
Disturb its still and glassy sleep,
The hours have spent in pure delight,
And wandering feet forgot to roam,
While waved the banners of the night,

The Rose that blooms in Sharon's vale,
And scents the purple morning breath,
May in the shades of evening fail,
And bend its crimson head in death;
And earth's bright ones, amid the tomb,
May like the blushing rose decay;
But still the mind, the mind shall bloom,
When time and nature fade away.

And there, amid a holier sphere,
Where the archangel bows in awe,
Where sits the King of glory near,
And executes his perfect law,
The ransomed of the earth, with joy,
Shall in their robes of beauty come,
And find a rest without alloy,
Amid the Christian's happy home.

ENGLAND'S EXCELLENCIES AND EVILS.

The following letter is the last of a series written from England by Prof. WRIGHT, and published in the Boston Morning Chronicle. It presents in an eloquent manner the reasons for hope or despondency in view of the present condition of that country.

Time, which tarries not for mortals, has brought me to the close of my look at England. It is very awkward to sum up and generalize when one has only begun to observe; therefore, understand me as giving generalizations of things as they seem to me—what a fly, that lights upon England for a twinkling and is off, thinks of it.

As to the bounties of Providence—substantial blessings and beauties—I cannot conceive how more could well have been granted in the same space, than is the lot of this, so far as nature has made it, "merrie England." After seeing the golden harvests of the rich eastern counties and Yorkshire, the meadows of the Thames, above all, the garden valley of the Tweed; the mines of Derbyshire, and of another region to which the wise do not carry coals; the bens and lochs of Scotland; the pikes and fells, and dales and meres of Westmoreland; the springs of Malvern; the valleys of the Severn and the Wye—even taking a nap on the brow of the Wyndecliffe—surely I have a right to say, "Avaunt, all geography; this island is the very spot where the human race ought to develope itself in all its power and glory." But truly, the race, as a mass, is far and painfully below what a nurseling of republicanism, alighting on the Wyndecliff, and drinking in the beauties of the wide landscape, and knowing nothing more of England, would expect to find it. There is ignorance, and coarse brutality, and sullen hopelessness, and haggard wretchedness, far beyond what there ought to be in the midst of such beauties and blessings. Yet there is not a little, but a great deal among the human inhabitants, that is, like the landscape, noble, and lovely, and glorious—and that, not in one class, but in all classes, from the highest to the lowest. And a peep at history will convince one, too, that the race is here making a progress that is truly encouraging and sublime. Indeed, history writes this upon the landscape. The old feudal castles, now possessed by ivy and owls; the ruinous abbeys, the dimly-remembered battle fields and "Smithfields," are way-marks that show how the race has gone forward. The Alfreds, the Shakspeares, the Hampdens, the Newtons, the Miltons, the Howards, ths Wesleys, the Hogarths, have not lived in vain. Their mantles are worn worthily by men whom it might be invidious to mention now, but who will shine as the stars by and by; men who are doing what Cromwell did, in a wiser way. They have approached in fact, nearer than in form, to the desired goal. In enumerating the governing powers of England, you have not done when you have mentioned king, lords, and commons. The press is to be named, and that not at the tail of the list. The press has outgrown the power of what is called the government, to control it either by fear or favor. Look at the Times newspaper, with a net revenue equal to that of a third-rate European potentate. Ministers have bribed it till it is beyond the reach of their bribery. They look up to it with fear and trembling, and a degree of humble obedience. It is the voice of the most vigorous intellect of England, saying what will be most likely to find an echo in the breasts of one hundred thousand independent Englishmen as they swallow their buttered toast and boiled egg. Look at Punch, too, with wit and wisdom enough to insure him a hundred patents of immortality. He governs a great part of England, very much for its good. The Pecksniffs of the land take hints from him, much to the benefit of their dupes. Hence one may conclude that England is growing, and has grown, wiser, and, of course, happier. Yet if one were to task himself, to write down the folly, and humbug, and unhappiness of England, it would be difficult to decide where to begin, and quite impossible to end.

England may be said to live under a trinity of evil, kingcraft, priestcraft, and beercraft. In this let me not be understood to speak disrespectfully of that interesting daughter of Eve, the queen, who with such exemplary patience obeys the command imposed upon her aforesaid mother, nor of the reverend clergy, nor yet of the noble brewers, many of whom write sir before and bart. after their names. They are all honorable persons, I hope and trust; but the craft to which they were born or bred, does, I am sure, cost England immeasurable woes. O that I had the eye of a prophet, and could say that there was visible in the dimest distance of the future, any thorough relief. As it is, sanguine hope, without seeing any thing, guesses that deliverance must come, somehow and at some time or other. The order in which the evils press upon the country seem to me to be, first beercraft, second priestcraft, third kingcraft. Till the beercraft is removed—till the people get the clear heads and strong hearts which pure water gives,—in vain you lift at the others. Suppose you abolish the taxes and tithes, and give England a cheap government, and free-church, and full suffrage, to what will it amount, so far as the masses are concerned? Precisely to more beer and consequences of beer! I may be mistaken; truly I have found warm and zealous promoters of thorough temperance, but they seem to be regarded as the maddest of fanatics. Nine men out of ten among the laboring classes, so far as I have been able to observe, and I have been quite inquisitive, have not the slightest barrier between themselves and stupidity and drunkenness, but their inabilty to get enough beer. It is their undoubted creed that beer is a blessing, and one of their deepest sorrows that their wages will not allow them to get plenty of it, with a drop or two of gin by way of luxury. Look at poor chartism, befogged in beer! fighting as often as any way against itself, and selling to its worst enemies even the little suffrage it commands! If the masses of England could be roused to enter upon the career so gloriously begun by those of Ireland, they would soon take a position which would settle many of the knottiest questions of politics, and the crafts of the priest and the king would be swept away like the meshes of the spider. The state and the church would then take their places as servants of the people—not masters. Yet with all this, which to an American mind is so evident, staring them in the face, there are plenty of sincere philanthropists here, enemies of slavery, of corn laws, of church tyranny, of a vampyre aristocracy, who will pity you for not drinking wine with them! who will raise the cup of Circe to their own lips, and then lament the oppression and degradation of England's poor! Put the brewers of England in the same condition with her feudal castles and monasteries, and her poor will soon take care of other vampyres.

There is one sign of the times, however, which is hopeful. The discovery in Germany of the wonderful sanatory properties of cold water, is making a deep impression upon the higher and middle classes here. The doctors are not able to laugh it down. After spending fortunes on physicians in vain, invalids go to Grafenburg and are healed. A child with the scarlet fever is wrapped in a wet sheet and gets well. Men rummage their libraries, and find that just such cures have been performed at Melvern a hundred years ago, and the water when analyzed is the purest possible. And they find cases in which patients with raging fever and delirium have broken loose from their nurses and jumped into the Thames or some horsepond, and their madness has proved better than the wisdom of the doctors. Many are coming to the conclusion, that disease is chiefly some mysterious modification of that great poison, diet, with which we are sent into this world to battle, and this rebounds greatly to the advantage of pure water. Setting poisons to catch poisons is growing into disrepute with these people, and consequently they may by and by be expected to see the absurdity of sending one dram of alcohol into the stomach to cure the disease made by its predecessor. The multitude of experiments which have now put the matter fairly to the test, seem to demonstrate that coldness combind with pure water, is the best means that has ever been tried to quench human inflamation, and when properly applied will cure any patient who has strength to be cured in any way. This being true, the occupation—I do not say of the doctors, for it will require science and wisdom to apply cold water—but of the druggists—of all medical poison manufacturers, is gone. And shall not alcohol be included? From the hold this subject has taken of the most intelligent here, I look for a great pathological reform, which I think cannot fail to set the principle of total abstinence upon a more commanding foundation than it has hitherto occupied. If you can get the wine out of the heads of the philanthropic of the higher class, then will they see clearly the effects of beer upon the lower. Both once delivered, the nation would not be long in discovering the folly of working itself to death to support a class of grand and idle hereditary pickpockets, nor long in devising means of relief. See if the new vision bestowed upon the Irish people does not work out such results. England wants an oculist like Father Mathew.

POST-OFFICE LABELS.

We copy the following article from a London paper, partly because the information it affords may be of use on our side before long. We hope to see the day when cheap postage and the convenient label system will be established among us also.

POSTAGE LABELS AND ENVELOPES.—The following facts relative to the manufacture of our present postage labels and envelopes may not be uninteresting to the reader. The manufacture of the postage envelope is effected by many powerful, yet accurate machines. The paper is pervaded by colored threads as a security against frauds; and when sent from the manufactory of Mr. Dickenson, it is delivered to the firm of Messrs. De La Rue. It is there cut into lozenges, by the engine of Mr. Wilson, with the utmost precision, at the rate of 60 or 80,000 a minute. Previous to being stamped, each lozenge has a notch cut in each side for the convenience of folding; this is done by an angular chisel. The envelopes are then stamped at Somerset House, by a machine which combines the operation of printing and embossing—the invention of the late Sir. W. Congreve. The last process, the folding and gumming, is performed by the Messrs. De La Rue, who employ thirty-nine folders on an average; and a quick hand can fold 3,500 a day. One engraving on Mr. Perkins' hard steel roller will afford 1680 transfers to soft steel plates; these again will, when hardened, admit of 60,000 impressions being pulled upon each, so that one original will afford 100,800,000 impressions of labels. Twelve years ago common envelopes were sold at 1s the dozen; now the postage envelope, with its medallion, may be bought wholesale at a half a farthing, exclusively of the stamp; and yet, though the manufacture is peculiarly costly, it returns a small profit to the government. More than 220,000,000 of chargeable letters were posted in 1843; so that supposing all the letter boxes in the United Kingdom to be open twelve hours in the day, and to communicate with one large spout, the letters would keep flowing through it at the mean rate of fourteen in a second.

COUNTENANCE.—Amenity of temper has a great effect upon the countenance. It is a foe to wrinkles of all kinds. A woman lately died at Peoria, over 70 years of age, and it is said her face was as smooth and her skin as soft as a young girl's. But she was a quiet, tranquil-hearted creature. Care never troubled her, and she had never been known to frown. Verily, indeed,

"How noiseless falls the foot of Time,
When it only treads on flowers."

A LEGAL PARADOX.—An ejectment case tried at Utica, recently, presented this singular result. The defendant paid for a piece of land by the acre. There was a dispute about the boundary and his neighbor sued him. It was found that he had the whole quantity he had purchased, without coming on the disputed territory. He was beaten. He then recovered back from his granter, on this warranty, part of his purchase money. A new trial was obtained in the ejectment suit, and he is now successful in that:—so in the first place he gets land which he did not buy, in the next place, makes another man pay him for it, and finally holds both the land and the money. This goes beyond the celebrated cracked kettle case, in which the borrower said he should prove, firstly, that he had never had it, secondly, that it was cracked when he got it, and thirdly, that it was whole when he returned it.

APPLE BREAD.—A Frenchman has invented and practiced with great success a method of making bread with common apples, very superior to potato bread.

After having boiled one-third of peeled apples, he bruised them quite warm into two-thirds of flour, including the proper quantity of yeast, and kneaded the whole without water, the fruit being quite sufficient. When the mixture had acquired the consistency of paste, he put it in a vessel, in which he allowed it to rise for twelve hours. By this process he obtained bread, full of eyes, and extremely palatable and light.

YANKEE NOTIONS.—A vessel cleared at Boston, last week, for Demarara, with the following cargo; 150 bbls. apples, 16 kegs butter, 10 bbls. carrots, 3000 cabbages, 200 celery roots, 15 boxes cheeses, 6 half bbls. cranberries, 50 bbls green corn, 10 half bbls. eggs, 3000 fresh fish, 75 live hogs, 200 lobsters, 50 bbls. onions, 100 boxes oyesters, 50 bbls. potatoes, 75 live sheep, 50 half bbls. turnips, 10 boxes poultry, 15 boxes peaches and pears, 150 tons ice. [Jour. of Com.

SINGULAR PHENOMENON.—On Wednesday, Sept. 11th, about 9 o'clock, was observed from the deck of the sloop Mount Vernon, by Capt. J. P. Smith, and also by all his crew, what to all appearance was a star, but of such a size and brilliancy, considering the sky was unclouded, and the sun pouring down its rays with unusual lustre, as to almost lead to the belief that it was some supernatural vision. This singular phenomenon is represented as being, in appearance, nearly equal to the size of the moon. It remained visible nearly the whole day, and disappeared only as the shades of night were fast approaching, when all expected to have a better and more distinct view of this brilliant and apparently erratic heavenly body. Capt. S. states it to have presented an appearance, in color, similar to that of the planets at night only a shade whiter. [Key West Light of the Reef.

A PLACE TO LIVE IN.—In traveling in Wisconsin Territory, a correspondent of the Cleveland Herald was assured that the township of Milton, Rock county, raised 70,000 bushels of wheat last year; that not a glass of liquor was ever sold in the township; and that in no one year has a justice of the peace ever received fees enough to pay for a barrel of salt.

AGRICULTURAL ITEMS.

From the Cultivator for October.

EXPERIMENT.—A gentleman cultivated two hills of cucumbers, each having the same number of plants, under precisely the same circumstances, excepting in the following particular, viz: the ground around one hill was hoed every day, as long as the state of the vines would admit—the other was hoed just often enough to keep down the weeds, but no more. The hill which was hoed every day, produced more than twice the quantity of cucumbers that the other did. Who can give the "why and because?"

A HINT.—Don't suffer your revolving hay-rake, and your wagon rack, and hand rakes, and whatever else you have used in the haying and harvesting just finished, to be out in the fields exposed to the weather, but see them well housed for another season. The weather destroys more tools than hard work, with some farmers; and more valuable time is lost hunting up and repairing lost implements, than their original cost.

COST OF FENCING.—Mr. Biddle, in an address before the Philadelphia Ag. Society in 1842, makes some calculations as to the cost of fencing, which will surprise those who have paid little attention to the subject. He estimates the expense of farm fences in Pennsylvania, and gives the data upon which his calculations are based, at $105,600,000. He thinks that the interest on this outlay, and the annual wear and tear of fences, is equal to an annual tax of $10,000,000 upon the farmers of that State.

MORTALITY AMONG SYCAMORES, OR BUTTONWOOD.—The destruction of sycamores which has for several years been complained of in Massachusetts and some of the other eastern States, begins to be seen here. We have noticed several trees along the river, and some in other places, which will hardly survive the season. We are not aware that the cause of this destruction has been yet fully ascertained. Some suppose it to be an epidemic, which commencing (as did the cholera,) at the east, is sweeping over the country, Others alledge that the cause of death is a minute insect, which corrupts the sap. Others think that the severe frosts of the last three winters have occasioned the trouble.

CEMENT FOR GLASS WARE.—Cover the broken edges with a thin coat of common whith-lead paint, and then pass a cord round the glass article or vessel, to bind the parts closely together. In a few weeks it will become perfectly dry, and will be found to have adhered very firmly together. Tried by the writer and known to be good.

STANZAS.

Dedicated to the Board of the Mariner's Family Industrial Society, of the Port of New York.

I love the sailor! and I joy to know
That noble hearts are pledged to work his weal;
My soul exults the Bethel Flag to show
And hails the homes, whose inmates for him feel.
I love the sailor—and the sailor's rights,
But dearer still to me, will ever prove
The interests of my sex, whom love unites
To those who roam—these share my warmest love.

They need our sympathy—the ones whose lot
It is to "watch and wait" through weary time,
Ere those they love with glad return can blot,
The memory of those hours that waste their prime.
Ah! marvel not, if soon the eye grow dim,
The cheek turn pale, the brow its light forego;
They change with watching, and the bridal hymn,
Soon tunes "its cadence to a mournful flow."

Wealth may be theirs, but if the heart be true
To "woman's mission," think ye not they sigh
For those kind looks, and words that could imbue
Their life with sweetest joys? Ah! lowly lie
The gifts of fortune when the spirit weeps
In bitter loneliness which none may share:
And sad the vigils the poor lone one keeps;
Wealth gives no wings to faith, no zeal to prayer.

But when to absence from the loved, we add
The ills of poverty, the want, the dread,
Which often bid the sailor's wife, grow sad
And wring from childhood's lip the cry for bread!
Oh say! should we not haste such wo to sooth,
And bind their wounds with pity's ready hand;
Before their feet life's rugged pathway smooth,
And answer to the sailor's child's demand?

Yes, surely yes! 'tis duty thus to do—
But mark the channel through which aid should flow.
Mark! lest by chance a deadlier thorn ye strew,
And fearful harvests from your seed there grow.
Help them! but not by alms unless ye seek
To crush the spirit that is bending low;
Drive not all self-dependence from the weak,
Teach them how best they can their strength bestow.

Thank God! one band of sisters in our midst,
Are aiming thus the lab'rer's path to cheer;
Aid them, amid their weakness, thou who didst
Not scorn the lowliest place while toiling here!
Incline the hearts of all, who love the poor,
Who love the sailor; and who love their God;
The "Charity of Wages" to ensure,
To all who bend beneath want's iron rod.

ALMIRA.

New York, Aug. 30th, 1854.

"Oh, thou beautiful
And unimaginable ether! and
Ye multiplying masses of increased
And still-increasing lights! what are ye? what
Is this blue wilderness of interminable
Air, where ye roll along, as I have seen
The leaves along the limpid streams of Eden?
Is your course measured for ye? Or do ye
Sweep on in your unbounded revelry
Through an aerial universe of endless
Expansion, at which my soul aches to think,
Intoxicated with Eternity."

GOOD ADVICE.—Girls, beware of transient young men—never suffer the addresses of a stranger; recollect one good steady farmer's boy or industrious mechanic is worth more than all the floating trash in the world; the allurements of a human dandy-jack with a gold chain about his neck, a walking stick in his paw, some honest tailor's coat on his back, and a brainless, though fancy skull, can never make up for the loss of a kind father's home—a good mother's counsel, and the society of brothers and sisters; their affection lasts, while that of such a young man is lost at the wane of the honey moon. 'Tis true.—Ex. paper.

TO YOUNG MEN.—Be cautious of that young lady who runs from the wash tub to change her dress at your approach—you will want a long purse to support her. Also beware of her, with half a dozen rings on her fingers, and who sits in church with her glove off, that all she has of any value about her, may be seen to advantage; she will, if you wed her, soon get the RING of poverty in your nose.—Ib.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location, thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y. The fall term will open on WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 14th, under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

FRANCIS BAMPFIELD.

[Concluded.]

SOME ACCOUNT OF HIS BOOKS.

Mr. Bampfield several times refers to the books which he had written, as proof of his care for the churches and the truth. Some of these books are upon most interesting themes, are prepared with great care, and embody the results of long-continued and patient investigation. They afford good evidence of his diligence, and are exceedingly instructive and convincing upon many disputed points in theology. As a writer, he is remarkable for the variety of thought and expression with which all his books are enriched, whatever may be the subject. Arguments and illustrations are often drawn from the most unexpected sources, yet with such ease and appropriateness as to please rather than offend. His style, however, as well as his reasoning, often seems to be somewhat involved and obscure. But it is not the obscurity of ignorance or of ill-chosen language; it is rather from the originality and intricacy of the thought itself. Those who become accustomed to read his works, will meet with no difficulty from this source, but will thank him for leading them, even by such a path, into fields of thought which they had never before explored. Hence it has happened, that by his intimate friends and thorough readers, Mr. Bampfield has been enthusiastically admired for the very things which have induced others to throw aside his books. His earnest and fearless investigation of truth, his fervent and loving appeals on its behalf, and his cheerful obedience to it, entitle him to a high place among the writers of that fruitful age to which John Bunyan and his coadjutors belonged.

Mr. Bampfield's works were mostly printed during the last twelve years of his life, and came forth in the following order:

1. “The Judgment of Mr. Francis Bampfield for the observation of the Jewish or Seventh-Day Sabbath, with his Reasons and Scriptures for the same, in a letter to Mr. Ben, of Dorchester.” London: 1672.

The above letter was written from the prison at Dorchester, 1665, in reply to the two letters of inquiry before mentioned, calling his attention to the question which day ought to be kept as the Sabbath. It was published in connection with a letter from Mr. Ben.

2. “The Open Confessor, and the Free Prisoner.” Printed in 1675.

This sheet was written when he was a prisoner in Salisbury, and was designed to show, that he had neither done nor taught what he was afraid to avow, and that although a prisoner he was yet the Lord's freeman.

3. “All in One; all Useful Sciences and Profitable Arts, in one Book of Jehovah Aelohim, copied out and commented upon in created beings, comprehended and discovered in the fullness and perfection of Scripture knowledge. By Francis Bampfield, a lover and admirer of Christ and of his Word and Works.” London: 1677.

None of Mr. B.'s books give so full an exhibition of his character as this. His familiarity with the best masters and schools had led him to the conclusion, that what was called science and theology had very little connection with the Word of God, and was mere conjectural reasoning. He believed that the Scriptures were “a perfect library of all saving knowledge and profitable science,” and that the wise in heart could understand them. He therefore determined to write a book explaining his belief and illustrating its soundness. In this he shows that the most philosophic disputations are mere skirmishes of hard words; that those who talk most about science cannot fully explain the simplest things, such as hearing, tasting, feeling; and that it is only through the study of the Bible, with a true heart and an obedient disposition, that men are safe from error and sure of success. Having explained his design, he commences with the account of creation, speaks at length of the work of each of the six days, and in connection therewith discusses the nature of light and heat, the falling of rain, blowing of the wind, growth of plants and trees, movements of the heavenly bodies, natural history, and the science of human life. Each of these subjects grows out of the work of that day under which they are spoken of; as, for instance, the growth of herbs under the third day, and the history of man under the sixth day. What he calls the “first part” of his book, is occupied with the work of the first six days. The “second part,” which is properly another book, has the following title:—

“The Seventh-Day Sabbath the Desirable Day, the closing completing day of the first created week; which was, and is, and will be, the just measure of all succeeding weeks in their successive courses, both for working on the six foregoing days, and for rest on the seventh, which is the last day, by an unchangeable law of well-established order, both in the Revealed Word and in Created Nature.”

In this “second part,” every question connected with the institution, early observance, pretended change, and present binding authority of the Sabbath, or seventh day, is fully discussed, and much light is thrown upon each. The whole book would fill one thousand pages of an ordinary octavo volume, and cannot be read without interest and instruction.

4. “The House of Wisdom; the House of the Sons of the Prophets; an House of Exquisite Inquiry and of deep research; where the mind of Jehovah Aelohim in the Holy Scriptures of truth, in the original words and phrases, and their proper significancy, is diligently studied, faithfully compared, and aptly put together, for the further promoting and higher advancing of Scripture knowledge of all useful arts and profitable sciences; in the one Book of Books, the word of Christ, copied out and commented upon in created beings—As a second Essay in pursuit of the same design held forth in a former treatise, entitled, All in One. By the same author, more and yet more a lover and admirer of Christ and of his Word and Works.” London: 1681.

This book unfolds a plan for religious education, and especially the education of men for the ministry. In a postscript the author announces his intention “freely to impart what in his measure he hath freely received, to any sons whom the Lord shall make willing to be Christ's disciples in this school. Three times in each week, there will be these exercises: One about the proper significancy of original words and phrases; another about Philosophy; a third about textual sermons; to which may be added a specimen or example of some particular art or science.”

5. “The Holy Scripture; the Scripture of Truth; the Holy Letters. A Grammatical Opening of some Hebrew words and phrases in the beginning of the Bible; wherein several Secrets in Nature and Mysteries in Grace are revealed, as grounded upon the letter and significancy of the original languages. As a further Essay in prosecution of the same great and good work commenced in the former treatises, entitled, All in One, and House of Wisdom.” London: 1684.

This book illustrates his plan of giving religious instruction. It is by first expressing the original word; then the significations; and lastly its connection with other parts of Scripture.

6. “A Name, an after one; A Name, a new one; or, An Historical Declaration of the Life of Shem Acher, especially as to some more eminent passages of his day, relating to his more thorough lawful call to the office and work of the ministry for about twenty years past; wherein Paul is propounded for an example, and the case, so far as it doth run parallel, is set down before it; though the pre-eminence is given unto Paul, and the glory of all ascribed in every part, and in the whole of it, unto Jehovah Aelohim, whose rich grace and free love has been, in all this, unsearchably rich and exceedingly abundant; wherein are also several other weighty cases and great questions stated and resolved—about the right of administration in perfecting a believer's baptism; about receiving a member in some case out of one church into another church in the same city, in the main of the same Gospel faith and order; and about the sound evidences of a state of grace.” London: 1681.

Some difficulty seems to have arisen between the church of Mr. Bampfield, and another church in the vicinity, about receiving a member without certificates of dismission. This led Mr. B. to write the above work, in which his views of a call to the ministry, of administering the ordinances, of church government, and several kindred questions, are fully presented. Under an assumed name he gives a short history of himself, which is both interesting and characteristic.

7. “The Lord's Free Prisoner; being a Narrative of the facts connected with the imprisonment of Francis Bampfield.” London: 1683.

8. “A Just Appeal from the Lower Courts on Earth to the Highest Court in Heaven; or, the case of F. B., the Lord's free prisoner, truly reported as to the matter of fact at his examination and trial in the open Quarter Sessions at the Old Baily, vulgarly the 12th and 13th days of the 8th month, 1683.”

9. “A Continuation of a former Just Appeal from the lower courts on earth to the highest court in heaven, in the case of F. B., about his not taking the oath of allegiance under his circumstances.” London: 1683.

In the last of these three works the whole subject of taking oaths is handled in such a manner as to show, that Mr. B. did not act ignorantly in regard to it, whatever may be thought of his scruples. The three works together give a complete account of the circumstances of his trial, with which the reader has already been made familiar.

From this notice of Mr. Bampfield's books it will be justly inferred, that he was a man of laborous habits. Whether engaged in his studies, or in the other duties of his office, he seems to have done with his might what his hands found to do. He had collected a large library, which he was anxious to have preserved for the benefit of the churches, and which he therefore willed to them on certain easy conditions. Through a misunderstanding, these conditions were never complied with, and the books were scattered. His own works, however, continue, and will long be read with satisfaction. He several times speaks of his joy in being able to leave behind him books through which he might speak, though dead; and all who have been permitted to peruse those books have partaken of his joy.

Religious.

AN IMPORTANT INQUIRY.

The following article was written by a lady, and appeared first in the Christian Intelligencer. It presents so truthful a picture of a crying evil, that we cannot forbear to publish it.

Do you punctually and promptly pay to your pastor the annual sum promised him, when he came to perform the duties of his office among you as a laborer in the vineyard of the Lord?

When a clergyman stipulates with his people for a definite amount as a regular salary, it is a common business transaction. There is no gift asked or promised; it is to be for value received that you obligate yourselves to pay the sum proposed. You neither expect or desire to have the services of a clergyman without a suitable compensation; for the same blessed Gospel that he proclaims, makes this provision for his necessities: “They that preach the Gospel shall live of the Gospel.” Neither would you be willing to spend life, and its brief probation, where the blessings of the sanctuary are not enjoyed.

The clerical profession is not chosen with reference to money-making, or hoarding wealth, but of laboring in the cause of Christ, of promoting the welfare of man, in every possible way, and the glory of God in efforts to do good. The flattering prospects which the world presents, of wealth, fame, and self-indulgence, are relinquished for the conscientious discharge of the multiform duties of this sacred office.—Well for our nation—well for the moral condition of the world—well for our hopes beyond the narrow limits of time, that there are some willing to make the sacrifice.

The clergyman that has made up his mind to this course as his solemn duty, labors in his study when the close air and confinement of these toils exhaust his energies, and waste his physical strength. He attends to the interest of his people amid many discouragements that try his faith and patience. He is expected to remember, even if they forget; he must be at the post of duty if they are not; he must toil when they rest, and be “instant in season,” improving all the opportunities of usefulness that lie in his sphere. The frequent demands upon his time, his influence, his sympathies, his energies, absorb all his soul—and in addition to this, ought he to have occasion to feel that his church, his people, have failed in their duties to him? That they are compelling him to live, to labor, and spend his valuable time, without paying him what they had promised, and on which he of course is depending for temporal sustenance? This may be the case—this has been the case, when the fact was not generally known.

Have you ever thought what supports your clergyman when you neglect to pay him? Others are guilty of the same, thinking that the rest are punctual. You know not the evils you cause by deferring, supposing some other time will do as well. He has no other income, no other resource. It is not his business to make money; had it been, he might at this moment have been surrounded with the luxuries of wealth; but he is simply and confidingly relying on your promises for the “hire” of which he has high authority for believing that he is “worthy.”

A clergyman must live more expensively than many in a private capacity. His family must welcome the stranger and wayfaring in their kindest hospitalities administer succor to the needy, and help to the destitute. These duties are incumbent on all, but these claims come upon him with greater frequency than on others; and what would be thought of that pastor that would turn away unaided any child of want among those that apply for kindness or charity. He gives his hearty approbation to the cause of benevolence; and often while he is suffering the nonpayment of his own means of living. Suffering in his feelings from such neglect on the part of those for whom his best and most faithful efforts are made, and his constant services bestowed, he stands up and pleads for the cause of God, and ask you to give to the Home Missionary, with a full sense of the missionary's wants, trials, and sacrifices; to the Foreign Missionary, with many of his discouragements lying at his own heart. Still he goes forward, as faithfully discharging his own duties as if his people had not forgotten theirs to him!

Let the churches see to it, that this sin resting upon them hinders not God's Spirit from descending in blessings abundant. Are not those vineyards barren and unfruitful where this blighting rests? “If we regard iniquity in our heart, the Lord will not hear,” though we have many meetings for prayer, and are ever so punctual in the outward forms of religion! The prosperity of Zion is hindered, for it is a heinous sin in the sight of God thus to “keep back part of the price.”

See to it that the truthfulness of your promises be inviolate, and that to the other cares and anxieties of a servant of Christ, you lay not upon him the burdens of worldly trial, perplexity, and debt, which the early performance of your engagement would prevent. It is high time that this cause had an Agent, and that Agent should be Christian people.

Could you see your Pastor's heart, could it be laid bare before you; there you would find not only a weight of embarrassment and trouble, but a nervous shivering dread of the cold charities of the world. Not because he has not well earned a competent living, but the careless management of those who engaged to pay him, has deprived him of what he expected to receive, and what his family, by taxing the most skilful ingenuity, had saved for the exigencies of the failure!

It is not a clergyman pleading his own cause, but one who knows too well that injustice is practiced, and that, too, without a just sense of the evils it causes, or the guilt which it incurs! Not that it is true of all churches, for there are many honorable and blessed exceptions. But let the inquiry be made:—Do you pay? is the salary paid by others? and you will find deficiencies where they were least expected.

The man who subscribes 50 or 60 dollars a year for the support of the sacred ministry, is thought to be liberal indeed. But look at the clergyman himself; he not only gives all that he might gain in any other profession, but in many instances, every thing but a bare living, and that too spun out by his credit, if he is not well paid.

I have seen too many of these evils, not to feel that the subject has been already too long neglected. The pastor has been silent; he has borne his trials in secret, only asking for a fulfilment of an honest obligation. This is all that is required, and even more. No people should wait for this; they know when their liabilities are due, and should have it all made up and promptly paid before he has occasion to ask it. I have seen those who have been laboring years, living on promises that were as deceitful as the “treacherous sea,” incurring debts that necessity had urged—pledging his word, for the word pledged to him, and at length charged with being indifferent about that word, and not obeying the injunction, “owe no man anything.” I have known clergymen of the most perfect integrity suffering the loss of credit among men of business on this account. And even has it been the case, his debts could not be secured without the aid of law; and this because his people had not kept their promises with him. Where, under such circumstances, is the blame? Where the guilt? The unoffending victim suffers—but let the church who has caused evils like these, who has failed in her punctuality, failed in her first duty, come forward to bear the stigma, and amend her faults.

Energy, punctuality, with sound moral principle, will prevent and remedy this evil. Let every church in our land defend herself from its scourgings, that the blessing of the Lord may descend in its refreshing influence upon her, and cause her to be “like a tree by the rivers of water, whose leaf shall not wither.”

BISHOP BEVERIDGE'S RESOLUTION.

I am resolved, by the grace of God, to make the Divine Word the Rule of all the Rules I propose to myself.

As the will of God is the rule and measure of all that is good, so there is nothing deserves that name, but what is agreeable and conformable thereto. And this will being fully revealed and contained in the Holy Scriptures, it will be necessary for me, in directing my course over the ocean of this world, that I should fix my eye continually upon this star, steer by this compass, and make at the only landmark, by which I am to be guided to my wished-for haven. I must not, therefore, have recourse to the inward workings of my own roving fancy, or the corrupt dictates of my own carnal reason. These are but blind guides, and will certainly lead me into the ditch of error, heresy and irreligion, which, in these our self-admiring days, so many poor souls have been plunged in. Alas! how many hath the impetuous torrent of blind zeal and erroneous conscience, borne down into a will-worship and voluntary subjection of themselves to the spurious offspring of their own deluded fancies! If the light that is within them doth but dictate any thing to be done; or rather, if the whim doth but take them, that they must do thus or thus, they presently set about it, without ever consulting the sacred writings, to see whether it is acceptable to God, or displeasing to Him. Whereas, for my own part, I know not how any thing should be worthy of God's accepting that is not of God's commanding. I am sure the word of God is the good old way that will certainly bring me to my Father's house—for how should that way but lead to heaven, which Truth itself has chalked out for me? Not as if it was necessary, that every one of my resolutions should be contained word for word, in the Holy Scriptures; it is sufficient, that they be implied in, and agreeable thereto. So that, though the manner of my expression may not be found in the word of God, yet the matter of my resolutions may be clearly drawn from thence. But let me dive a little into the depth of my sinful heart! What's the reason of my thus resolving upon such an exact conformity to the will and word of God? Is it to work my way to heaven with my own hand? to purchase an inheritance in the land of Canaan, with the price of my own holiness and religion? or to swim over the ocean of this world, into the heaven of happiness upon the empty bladders of my own Resolutions? No!

CHEERFULNESS.

The highest achievement of moral philosophy is to rise above the cares, vexations and disappointments of life; and religion, resting upon a divine basis, buoys the true Christian above the evils that surround him, and inspires him with moral fortitude and vigor to battle with every calamity, and to maintain an unruffled spirit amid the billows and conflicting currents which agitate the ocean of our existence. If a hurricane rages, instead of yielding to its fury, and giving way to despondency, he exerts every energy to ward off danger, and strives to look forward, indulging a soothing hope that the future will be less disastrous than the present. This method of encountering the evils to which everybody in a greater or less degree is exposed, deprives disappointment of its sting, is an antidote to the poison of slander, and begets a spirit of cheerfulness which is essential to happiness. He is like the eagle which, when clouds overspread the horizon, rises above them, to enjoy the sunshine. No matter how prosperous an individual may be in his pecuniary, domestic, and social relations, if he suffer his spirit to be discomposed by trifling annoyances, he is a stranger to enjoyment, and every day of his life is embittered by some petty cause of vexation, which his own morbid disposition magnifies into a serious calamity. On the other hand, [illegible] which can prostrate a man who has been disciplined to patient endurance, and has habituated himself to a uniform cheerfulness of mind.

PROTESTANT MARTYRS.

JOHN HUSS was offered a pardon when at the stake, and about to suffer for his attachment to Christ, if he would recant; his reply was, “I am here ready to suffer death.”

ANNE ASKEW, when asked under similar circumstances to avoid the flames, answered, “I came not here to deny my Lord and Master.”

THOMAS HAWKES, an Essex gentleman, said on a like occasion, “If I had a hundred bodies, I would suffer them all to be torn in pieces rather than recant.”

When the cruel Bonner told JOHN ARDLY of the pain connected with burning, and how hard it must be to endure it, with a view of leading the martyr to recant, he replied, “If I had as many lives as I have hairs on my head, I would lose them all before I would lose Christ.”

GEMS FROM RICHTER.

Do you desire to see a true pattern of piety? Look at that female bowed down with suffering, perhaps weeping and bleeding within, but yet looking away to God; and in calm confidence, preserving before others a serenity which the storms of the world neither dissipate nor darken. Where is her image in nature? It is found only in the sky. There stands the rainbow. The clouds and winds which fly above it and around it, do not move it—it shines forth before the sun, and its drops become beautiful colors, while it reposes upon the heavens, as the glistening dew of a bright and cheerful morning.

Beyond the sun, roll other suns, whose light has traveled for centuries down to the diminutive earth, but has not reached it. But thou, O gracious and ever-present ONE, as soon as the human spirit opens its feeble new-born eye, dost irradiate it with thy intelligence.

TRUTH IN THE STORM.

“Never,” says Coleridge, “does an important truth spread its roots so wide, or clasp the soul so stubbornly, as when it has braved the winds of controversy. There is a stirring far-heard music sent forth from the tree of sound knowledge, when its branches are fighting with the storm, which passing onward shrills out at once truth's triumph and its own defeat.” Let not the friend of truth, therefore, dread the approach of the tempest. It is in itself a time of darkness and terror; but is, also, the hour of truth's triumph. “God rides upon the whirlwind and directs the storm,” and as the tempest passes by, truth will appear shining upon us from a cloudless firmament, with a divine lustre with which it never shone before. Or, to keep up the figure of the great philosopher, the figure above cited, truth will be seen, like a tall cedar on the top of Lebanon, waving its branches with a strength, majesty and beauty, in which it never before appeared. “I come to send fire on the earth, and what will I if it be already kindled.”

THE BRAVE BOY.

Two boys of my acquaintance were one day on their way from school, and as they were passing a cornfield in which there were some plum trees full of ripe fruit, Henry said to Thomas, “Let us jump over and get some plums. Nobody will see us, and we can scud along through the corn, and come out on the other side.” Thomas said, “I am afraid. I do not like to try it. I would rather not have the plums than steal them, and I guess I will run along home.” “You are a coward,” said Henry; “I always knew you was a coward, and if you don't want any plums, you may go without them, but I shall have some very quick.” Just as Henry was climbing the fence, the owner of the field rose up from the other side of the wall, and Henry jumped back and ran off as fast as his legs would carry him. Thomas had no reason to be afraid. So he stood still, and the owner of the field, who had heard the conversation between the boys, told him he was very glad to see that he was not willing to be a thief; and then he asked Thomas to step over and help himself to as many plums as he wished. The boy was pleased with the invitation, and was not slow in filling his pockets with the ripe fruit.

Which of these boys was brave, the one who called the other a coward, but ran away himself, or the one who said he was afraid to steal, and stood his ground?

GROSS SUPERSTITION.—The cathedral of Treves is in possession of a vestment without seam, said to have been worn by Christ. This precious garment is exposed to the faithful only once in every century, except when the pope grants an express permission. This permission has been accorded by his holiness for this year, and the relict will be exhibited from August 18th to September 30th. The last regular exhibition was in 1809.

[Galignani.

What a glorious world this would be, if all its inhabitants could say in truth and sincerity, with Shakspeare's shepherd Corin, “Sir, I am a true laborer; I earn that I eat, get that I wear; owe no man hate; envy no man's happiness; glad of other men's good; content with my harm.”

NEW YORK, OCT. 17, 1844.

UNION IN THE CHURCH.

There has seldom been a period more distinguished than the present for talk about the peace and union of the church, and the coming together of the world. Yet it is doubtful whether a period can be named, in which there has been a stronger tendency to disunion. One needs only to read the religious journals of the popular denominations, to find sad proof of this. He will there see manifestations of exclusiveness, a disposition to exult in present attainments, and a satisfaction expressed at the failings of others, which promises any thing else rather than union and harmony. The strife between high-church and low-church dogmatists, between the advocates of different systems of reform, between Protestants so-called and Catholics, has been carried on not only with earnestness, but in many cases with unsurpassed bitterness.

In such circumstances, the question becomes an important one, as to what is the union recognized and approved by the Gospel. It is certain that much which is called union is neither desirable nor justifiable. A union in doing evil, which is by no means uncommon—or a union in doing nothing at all, which is much more common—few persons would dare to pray for. That union in religious communities, which results from a mutual agreement among its members to say nothing about the subjects concerning which they differ, or that which results from carelessness about these points of difference, instead of being real union, is only a cry raised of "peace, peace," when there is no peace. That apparent union in churches, which results from a pastor's professions of agreement with all his members, however widely they may differ from each other; or from his constant care to preach such things as are likely to please them all; or from closing the doors of the church and the mouths of individuals against the discussion of great moral and religious questions—is unworthy of the name of union, and will be broken up as soon as it is secured, with half the labor. It ought to be broken up, since it prevents a free and candid examination of truth, hinders the discharge of duty, and encourages the perpetuation of destructive errors. It is secured at the expense of sacrificing truth and conscience, and every day that it is continued, the same unreasonable price is paid for it.

But we believe there may be union in the church, so far as it is desirable, without such a sacrifice. In order to secure it, several things must be freely granted and faithfully done.

1. The right of individuals to study the Bible for themselves, and to act according to their convictions of duty, must be granted. The necessity of allowing this, is implied in the fact that each must give account of himself unto God. Yet the strict religionist often refuses it, unless one's convictions of duty shall correspond with his creed; and the latitudinarian refuses it, lest investigation should lead to strictness. Until this fearfulness is removed, union is impossible.

2. There must be a willingness to hear and consider the truth, though it may press hard upon us. Narrow minds seldom listen patiently to plain and needed truth, but often withdraw to escape from it. The consequence is, that the difference which at first existed is increased by its presentation. If professing Christians persist in shutting their ears against reproof, treating as enemies those who speak plainly to them, and making such persons offenders for a word, how can they be united? The Bereans were commended for their readiness to inquire after their duty, while the Pharisees were condemned for their self-sufficiency. To which class do the persons just described belong?

3. Strict discipline must be maintained. It is a false impression, that neglect of discipline is consistent with harmony in the church. Under this impression, men are often allowed to go on in the practice of evil surmising, backbiting, whispering, covetousness, and a variety of kindred sins, without rebuke, until heart-burnings, discord, and confusion, are the result. In most cases, the faithful administration of discipline would have easily put an end to such things. But allowing the leaven to work, the whole lump becomes affected to such an extent that remedies are comparatively useless.

4. There must be a disposition, on the part of individuals, to yield in some points to the opinions of others. True, no one can be asked to sacrifice principle for the sake of union. But there are many cases in which feeling must be sacrificed. In regard to almost every important movement of a church, there will be more or less difference of opinion among candid persons. If each determines that things shall be done exactly according to his view, nothing at all will be done. It is sometimes duty, in such cases, not only to consider candidly the reasons for an opinion different from our own, but to yield to the wishes of the body if it can be justly done. It is to be feared, that many persons, by a tenacity about their own way of doing things, and by an unwillingness to yield to others, have become responsible for the failure of most desirable objects.

5. A worthy object of pursuit must be set before the church. It is not more true of individuals than of churches, that the adversary always finds some evil work for idle hands to do. Unless there is something to be done for the advancement of religion without, there will be discord within. Even if there is work without, there may be discord; since in almost every large body there will be found some members who are "as [illegible] is favor of the object as any body," but who are yet afraid of being too hasty, do not know what becomes of the money contributed, or have some other way of throwing off responsibility. Nevertheless, the only safe way for a church is to persevere, and it will finally be seen, that by fixing their eyes upon a common object of interest, its members have been drawn nearer to each other.

Such we deem to be a union approved by the Gospel—a union which acknowledges the right of individuals, allows the free and thorough discussion of truth, maintains a strict discipline, cultivates a yielding disposition, and leads to earnest action. Wherever it is found, the blessing of God will rest upon it, and the truth will be advanced by it.

THE ALTERNATIVE OF SABBATARIANS.

"When we published, a few years ago, an extract from 'Luther's Table Talk,' condemning the legal views of the Sabbath which have been propagated by the Puritans, and exhorting Christians to 'ride, to dance, to feast' on Sunday, rather than give place to any encroachment upon the freedom of conscience, doubts were suggested by clergymen and others, whether Luther ever wrote or said any thing of the kind. At that time the anti-sabbatarian views of Luther, Calvin, and the German Reformers generally, were for the most part concealed from the people, and known only to the learned. But the secret is now exposed. It is no longer disguised by the clergy that Luther and Calvin were opposed to the doctrine of the divine authority of the 'Christian Sabbath.' This was freely admitted by the speakers at the Saratoga Convention, and canvassed as a thing no longer to be kept out of view.

"When this admission shall have had its legitimate operation on public opinion, there must be a great falling off of respect, either for the Sabbath, or for the reputation of Luther and Calvin. If the clergy continue to maintain that the Sabbath is the 'chief bulwark of Christianity,' how can they honor men who confessedly abandoned that bulwark to the enemy, or rather demolished it with their own hands? We judge that the advocates of the Sabbath, when the alternative is presented, will sacrifice the Reformers. The tendency of their present movements is to that end. When Luther and Calvin shall have been convicted of treason to Christianity by their own spiritual descendants, will not Popery triumph, and will not the religious system of New England and Protestantism generally, lose more as a whole, than it can gain for that part of it which is identified with the Sabbath? Calvinists will do well to consider whether it is wise to sink Calvin, for the sake of saving Dr. Bound's day."

REMARKS.

It surprises us, that a writer of so much discernment as the editor of the Perfectionist, should so far confound Sunday, or "Lord's Day," with the Sabbath, as to speak of their interests as identical. He knows that they are entirely different institutions, and were so considered by all of the early Fathers and the Reformers. Wherever, for a thousand years after the commencement of the Christian era, the term Sabbath is found, it must be understood of the seventh day; and the leaders of the Reformation denied the propriety or honesty of applying either the name or the laws of the Sabbath to the first day of the week. The admission of this fact, by those who advocate the claims of Sunday, we must regard as most favorable to the interests of the Sabbath. It weakens the confidence which many had ignorantly felt in a day of human appointment, and thus prepares their minds to consider candidly the claims of the only Sabbath. It will undoubtedly diminish the veneration of many persons for the names of Luther and Calvin; and it ought to do so. But it will deepen the conviction of such persons, that if they are to have any Sabbath at all, they must look for it alone in the Word of God. They will there find a Sabbath, which needs not the support of Fathers, Reformers, or Doctors. While, therefore, we cheerfully admit, that to give up either Luther, or the 'Christian Sabbath,' is a sort of alternative; yet we believe the true alternative is, either to hold to Luther and give up all Sabbaths, or to return to the Sabbath of the Bible.

In regard to what 'the Perfectionist' says about the triumphs of Popery, we may be permitted to suggest, that Popery now triumphs in the fact that the great body of Protestants observe a day of its own fostering; and we will venture to predict, that the general abandonment of that day for the day sanctioned by the Scriptures, would inflict a deeper wound upon Popery than it has ever yet received, and one from which it would never recover.

THE CHALLENGE.

A correspondent of the Religious Herald, recommends Messrs. Breckenridge, Rice and Plumer, who challenged Bishop Whelan, or any other three Roman Bishops or Priests, to discuss with them some leading points of doctrine, at issue between Papists and Protestants, to withdraw the challenge forthwith, "for," he says, "be assured, if you engage with the Papists, they will pour upon your defenceless heads such a torrent of abuse for stealing from their church the infant sprinkling rite, that you will be overwhelmed by the deluge. Verbum sat sapienti."

[Baptist Record.

We will venture, however, in the light of former disputes, to promise the correspondent of the Herald, that the first "torrent of abuse," will be "for stealing from their church" the practice of observing the first day of the week instead of the Sabbath. The "wise" should foresee the evil and hide themselves.

Distribution of Bibles.—In one county in Tennessee, five hundred and sixty-nine Bibles were recently distributed among those who were entirely destitute. This shows nearly one-fourth of the families to have been without the Bible. It is said that the destitution is still greater in the adjoining counties. There is no lack of missionary ground in our own country.

THE MISSION TO GREECE.

A document published by the American Board, containing some account of the recent visit of Drs. Anderson and Hawes to the mission stations in the East, recommends the abandonment of further efforts to evangelize the Greeks. The reasons given for the course are chiefly, that the people have withdrawn from the missionaries and become inaccessible to their preaching; that their political state is such as to render efforts comparatively useless; that their pride and aversion to strangers interpose a great barrier; that the arrogance and exclusiveness of the Greek church is equal to that of the Roman, and prevents its members from listening candidly to the truths of the Gospel when presented by Protestant ministers. In conclusion, the report refers to the disproportion which exists between the means that have been employed, and the results, in the following language:

"Twenty-seven ordained missionaries of different denominations have labored more or less in this field. A million of copies of books and tracts have been printed by different missionary societies, and scattered broad-cast over the Greek community. Two hundred thousand copies of the New Testament and parts of the Old have been put in circulation in the modern Greek language. Not a small number of Greek young men have been educated in America and England, by benevolent individuals and societies, and more than ten thousand Greek youth have been more or less educated in Greece and Turkey at the schools of the various missions. And yet, not ten persons are known, who are confidently believed to have been truly converted to God through these means!"

THE BIBLE IN THE GREEK CHURCH.

The Patriarch of Constantinople has recently issued an edict against the Bible, somewhat similar to that issued by the Pope of Rome. It is a sad proof of the degeneracy and formality of that church. The following extract is from the New York Observer:—

"And in the days of our most holy predecessors, as well as in our own, the church has not failed to write and to command your holiness most carefully to see to it, that within your diocese there be neither bought, nor sold, nor read by the Christians under your charge, anti-religious, anti-government books, such as entirely corrupt the Christian people in their politics, their religion, and their morals. And we do not doubt, that, obedient to ecclesiastical authority, you will discharge this your Episcopal duty, and watch most diligently that the Christians within your jurisdiction be not injured politically, religiously, or morally. And especially, influenced by the fact that the Old Testament has recently, (in the year 1840,) been translated from the Hebrew, we would recall to the remembrance of your holiness what the church has written at different times concerning this subject, commanding you unchangeably to perserve in watchfulness, and take good heed that this Old Testament, recently published, be neither bought, nor sold, nor read in your diocese, as not being received by the church, nor any kind of anti-religious, anti-government books. You are to prevent the Christians in your diocese from the sale, purchase, and reading of such corrupt books, that they may not be corrupted in their politics, their religion, or their morals; and you are, by your counsels and instructions, to confirm them in their civil and religious duties, that you may please God, the royal government, and your holy mother herself, the great church of Christ."

PERSECUTIONS IN MADAGASCAR.

The following statements are taken from a letter of one of the London Society's missionaries in Mauritius, not far from Madagascar. They show that the work of persecution is going on there in its worst form.

"Again the blood of martyrs of the Lord Jesus has been made to flow in the island of Madagascar. The district of Vonizongo is now stained with the blood of two devoted disciples belonging to the little flock which had for a long time taken shelter in a neighboring province. Having been seized and subjected to torture, but in vain, for the purpose of compelling them to impeach others, they were condemned to death, and ordered to be executed in their own country, one upon the Sunday, and the other on the Monday, in the market place. These days fell, I believe, upon the 19th and 20th of June last. To a messenger of the Christians, who took them food during the interval, they, on one occasion, whispered an affectionate farewell to all the Christians, saying, 'let them not fear that we shall disclose their names; we shall do them no harm, but say farewell! If we do not meet again on earth, we shall meet in the future life.' With unflinching fortitude they kept this noble promise to the last, and seemed to have been even cheerful in death. Obadiah, one of the Christian brethren, speaks of them as having only ascended into heaven before their companions. Their heads were cut off after execution, stuck on poles, and left to bleach in the scorching sun of Imerina, as an intended warning to the people, but serving as an additional evidence of the unmitigated barbarity of the Queen."

A letter from a native Christian in Madagascar, gives an account of other executions. It seems that some person had fixed a paper containing some reflections upon the government to the walls of a house. This so enraged the Queen that she by proclamation ordered the person to impeach himself within four days, or expect, if otherwise discovered, to be cut into pieces of the size of musket balls. When the four days had expired, and no one made confession, a Christian, who had been baptized and was a head teacher, was accused and compelled to drink the tangena ordeal, from which he died. Another of the persons taken up with him, was put to death for attempting to save him. They were cut in pieces and burnt. Seventeen native Christians, in all, have laid down their lives for the sake of the Lord Jesus.

A Missionary Fallen.—Rev. George H. Apthorp died at Oodoopitty, Ceylon, on the 8th of June last, aged 46 years. Mr. Apthorp was born in Quincy, Mass., 1798. After graduating at Yale College and Princeton Theological Seminary, he went to Ceylon in 1833, where he continued to labor until attacked by the typhus fever in May last, which terminated his life. His last hours were occupied with thoughts about the cause of Christ. One of his wandering exclamations was this, which ought to be impressed upon the mind of every Christian: "O! my God, when will the church cease to trust in this means and that means to build up Zion, and fall back upon simple personal consecration to Jesus Christ."

London Missionary Society.—The hundredth Anniversary of this Society occurred the present year. Circulars were issued, inviting all the churches which co-operate with it, to set apart the fourth Sunday in September for exercises to celebrate the event. The Society has sent out about 400 missionaries, exclusive of their families, and of about 50 medical missionaries, printers, artizans, and schoolmasters. It has now 170 missionaries, 131 native churches, and nearly 500 native teachers under its direction. Its expenditures for the last ten years have averaged about $375,000 per annum.

The Huguenots Slandered.—It is stated that the Paris Tract Society has recently published several Tracts in the language of Low Brittany, where the people are remarkably ignorant. In connection with these Tracts, they have distributed among them portions of the New Testament, in which the word Gentiles is translated Huguenots, thus leading the people to suppose that it was the Huguenots, or Protestants, who crucified the Lord.

Ministers Needed in Iowa.—A missionary writes to the Secretary of the Home Missionary Society, that there are sixteen counties in this Territory, north of the Iowa river, with but four ordained ministers—one minister to four counties. Truly, the laborers are few; pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that he would send forth laborers into his harvest.

An Old Association.—The one hundred and thirty-seventh Anniversary of the Philadelphia Baptist Association was held in Philadelphia on the 1st, 2d, and 3d inst.

Precept and Practice.—The Advent Herald, a leading organ of the Millerites, under date of Wednesday, Oct. 16, contains the following notice:

"As the date of the present number of the Herald is our last day of publication before the tenth day of the seventh month, we shall make no provision for issuing a paper for the week following. And as we are shut up to this faith—by the sounding of this cry at midnight, during the tarrying of the vision, when we had all slumbered and slept, and at the very point when all the periods, according to our chronology and date of their commencement, terminate—we feel called upon to suspend our labors and await the result."

Our Bible reads, "Occupy till I come." It also suggests, that when men say, "Lo here is Christ, or there, believe it not"; "go not after them."

A Mormon Notice.—Among the amusing advertisements with which our daily papers are enriched, the following beats any thing we have before seen:—"No rest to the wicked—hell howling—priests growling—honest men believing—and Mormonism triumphant! Eld. Adams, the Mormon lion, and Eld. Wm. Smith, brother of the martyred prophet and patriarch, will lecture tomorrow," &c.

N. Y. Union Theological Seminary.—We are happy to learn, that the prospects of this institution are highly encouraging. More than forty new members have joined the Seminary since the commencement of the term in October, and arrangements have been made to remove its former financial embarrassments.

The Episcopal Triennial Convention is now in session in Philadelphia, and has been since the 2d inst. Several exciting questions have been under discussion. Among them, the most interesting relate to Puseyism, and the questionable good character of two of their bishops. There is little, however, of general interest.

The Fair of the American Institute is still open, and has been receiving constant additions up to the present time.

Rev. Benjamin Harvey, a Baptist minister aged one hundred and ten years, preached at the Broad Street Baptist Chapel in Utica, on the last Sunday in September.

Governor Steele has appointed Thursday, the 14th of November, as a day of Thanksgiving.

By one who has spent seven years in Illinois and Wisconsin.

You must visit this country before you can form any conception of its beauty. I could fill pages in telling you of its splendor and resources. But it must suffice to say, that it is rapidly increasing in population and wealth, and will, ere long be the garden of the Union. The character of the people is changing from the recklessness incident to first settlements, to the refined and social character which the religion of the Bible never fails to produce. Churches are springing up in every part of the country. There is nothing to check the enterprise of the people, and it surmounts every thing. The cause of Temperance finds a rapid and healthy growth on our fertile prairies; and there are many villages here in which alcohol has never been sold.

Wheat is selling to-day (Sept. 27,) at 65 cents; oats at 20c, corn at 31c, potatoes at 25c, butter at 15c, and cheese at 8c.

Minutes of the General Conference.—We have received a copy of the Minutes of the Fortieth Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference, held at Verona, N. Y., September 11-15, 1844. In addition to the Minutes of the Conference, the pamphlet contains the proceedings of the American Sabbath Tract Society, and the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association. The whole is neatly printed, and deserves commendation. We gave so full an account of the doings of the Conference at the time, that we will only add now the summary appended to the statistics of the churches: Total number of churches 60; Ordained Ministers 52; Licentiates 22; Additions 301; Number of Members 5996.

AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY.

We have already noticed the Anniversary of this Society, which was held during the sessions of the Conference. We have since been favored with its printed proceedings, from which we copy the following

ABSTRACT OF THE REPORT OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

The Report expresses the conviction of the Board, that the Press is the best medium through which to promote the objects contemplated in the organization of this Society. Great good has already resulted from efforts made in this way. Within two years, an unprecedented interest has been awakened on the subject of the Sabbath throughout the country. Conventions have been held, societies formed, and various documents published. Though these movements do not result directly from the circulation of Sabbath publications, they have undoubtedly been influenced by it. The effort has served to show, that in order to have a Sabbath, we must have the Sabbath which God has given; and publications on the subject have therefore been sought, in many cases, with avidity. The result is decidedly favorable to the interests of the day for which the Society labors.

Anxious to carry out the objects contemplated in the present organization, the Board, soon after its appointment, entered upon negotiations with the N. Y. Sabbath Tract Society for the purchase of its stereotype plates, tracts, etc. After much consultation, it was thought advisable to await a response from the friends of the Society, before taking the responsibility of the purchase, and in the meantime to procure from the N. Y. Society such tracts as are needed for the agents of this Society. Though efforts have been made to secure that response, nothing has yet been heard which the Board has deemed sufficient to warrant the transfer; and it has not therefore been made.

Agreeably to a resolution of the Society, at its organization, Mr. William Freeman was appointed to labor as a colporteur and financial agent in the vicinity of the Central Association. Mr. Freeman labored for about two months in the vicinity of Albany, Troy, and other parts of Rensselaer county, and Philadelphia; at the end of which time his labors for the Society closed, after a consultation between him and the Board. He distributed about 3000 Sabbath publications, the cost of which, together with his wages, was about $100.

Elder Nathan V. Hull was also employed to labor in the vicinity of the Western Association, as a missionary and agent. In the performance of his duties, he visited most of the Sabbath-keeping Churches in that Association, formed several auxiliary societies, preached many times on the subject of the Sabbath, and circulated about 8000 Sabbath publications. The expense of this agency, for publications and wages, was about $117.

Elder Wm. B. Maxson, as agent for the Society, attended a "Sabbath Convention" at Utica, in November last, and was furnished with 1000 publications for the purpose, amounting to $18. His labor was gratuitously bestowed.

Elder Azor Estee, in a missionary tour performed under the direction of the Missionary Association, in December and January last, distributed 3200 publications for the Society, valued at $67; the expense of which was met by $25 from the Missionary Association, and $41 from the friends in Shiloh, N. J., and vicinity. He has since made an engagement with the Missionary Association for one year, has been requested to act as agent of this Society as opportunity offers, and has been supplied with 8500 publications, to the value of $72.

George B. Utter, as an agent of the Society, visited most of the churches in the Central Association during the months of January, February, and March last. He labored mainly to explain the objects of the Society, and promote a more efficient organization in the churches. In consequence of the discouraging condition of the Society, in presenting his report he tendered gratuitously his services. This the Board was reluctant to accept, on account of his former sacrifices. They however awarded him an order on the Treasury for the price of life-membership.

Knowing that the Eastern Association has had repeated calls for other objects during the year, the Board did not think it advisable to appoint an agent for that section.

Thus it will be seen, that while the Board has endeavored, as much as was consistent with maintaining the character of a Society, to limit its expenses, they have considerably exceeded the income. The responsibility of this rests upon the individual members of the Board. In such circumstances, they presume they will be excused for not augmenting them, by the purchase of the plates, tracts, etc., of the N. Y. Society. They hope the importance of the work in which we are engaged will be well considered by the Society at its session, and that efficient means will be taken to carry it on.

Shocking and Fatal Accident.—On Saturday afternoon, 12th inst. in Philadelphia, a number of Native Americans assembled with a field-piece for the purpose of firing salutes in honor of the victory gained in the County on Tuesday last. After having fired a number of times, and the piece becoming heated, in re-loading a premature explosion occurred, by which a man named Francis Roberts had his right arm and left leg shockingly fractured, and his body burned and face disfigured in the most melancholy manner, and another man named E. M. Foster, had his right arm fractured, which has since been amputated. Both were taken to the hospital. One is since dead.

Distressing Accident.—At the raising of a saw-mill in Garland, Me., on Saturday, 21st, one of the bands gave way and fell to the ground, striking in the fall, Mr. James Robinson, breaking all his ribs. Mr. Robinson lived but an hour and a half. Several others were hurt, but not seriously.

General Intelligence.

TORREY AND WALKER.

In a letter to the editor of the Emancipator, enclosing a subscription for these gentlemen, Alvan Stewart uses the following strong, yet truthful language:

"In national hypocrisy and unmeasured violence, in head mercy and heart cruelty, in constitution justice and practical villainy, we have run a race on the track of time, by which we have distanced all antiquity, and come out ahead of all the depravity of modern times. And when impartial history shall assign us our place, it will be on the right hand of Infamy herself, unless she should abdicate in our favor. O! where shall we hide ourselves when the great muster-roll of earth's villains shall be called? Look at the accomplished, humane, and pious Torrey, languishing and dying in the damps and chains of a Baltimore prison, for an act of mercy, in aiding a poor slave to liberty, which an angel might have forsaken his celestial employments to perform. Behold the brave and magnanimous Capt. Jona. Walker, a citizen of Massachusetts, prompted by the most daring generosity, in attempting to convey in his vessel, seven men who were enslaved, to a West India island; seven days out at sea, on the high way of all nations, where all are free, he is captured by a Florida wrecker, piratical from instinct, though barbarian by education, and brought to Key West—the plunder den of privileged robbery; where the functionary of injustice, instead of arresting the wrecker for this act of piracy, sends the deeply wronged Captain Walker to the old Spanish jail of Pensacola; where in filth, pestilence and chains, under tropical heat, he has passed the summer of 1844, and still remains, under the government of the United States, where death will most probably conclude his sorrows and distress!"

Election Returns.—Several State Elections have taken place within a short time past, concerning which we glean the following facts:

Pennsylvania.—Shunk, Democratic candidate for Governor, was elected by a majority of about 4000, over Markle, the Whig candidate. There is also a Democratic majority for Congress.

New Jersey.—Stratton, Whig candidate, for Governor, was elected by a majority of between one and two thousand, over Thompson, Democratic candidate. The Whigs have a majority of 29 in joint ballot.

Ohio.—Bartly, Whig, has a majority of 2000 over Todd, Democrat. The Whigs have likewise both branches of the Legislature; the Democrats have a majority of Representatives in Congress. The Liberty Party vote was about 10,000.

Georgia.—The Election was for Representatives in Congress only. Eight were to be elected, of whom probably five are Whig.

Maryland.—In this State the Whigs have elected their Governor, and a majority in both branches of the Legislature.

Later from Texas.—The New Orleans Bulletin of the 2d inst. contains some items of Texas intelligence, derived from a passenger overland, who left Galveston on the 14th ult.

Hon. Anson Jones was thought to have been elected to the Presidency, though the returns were not complete.

The decision of the Court Martial in the case of Commodore Moore had not been officially made known, and would not be until the sitting of the Congress. It was well understood, however, that the accused was fully acquitted.

The difficulties in Shelby county, which at one time threatened to involve eastern Texas in a civil war, have happily been quelled; the troops which were marched thither were disbanded without finding it necessary to fire a gun. Several persons belonging to each party came voluntarily forward and entered into bonds to keep the peace, and their comrades quietly dispersed. The troops which were assembled for the purpose of suppressing these broils, comprised about 700 men. The celerity with which the different counties complied with the requisitions which were made upon them to raise this force, is highly creditable to the character of the country, as are also the combined energy and forbearance displayed in quelling so serious a feud without bloodshed.

From Nauvoo.—The St. Louis New Era of Oct. 1, says, that Gov. Ford, with the forces under his command, has been at Nauvoo, where the Mormons were very distrustful of the Governor, and much alarmed at the hostile disposition manifested towards them by the troops individually. While the guard was being reviewed at the camp of the Governor, one of the Springfield cadets was accidentally shot in consequence of a false alarm purposely given to try the men; he died instantly. Intelligence one day later says that Sharp, the editor of the Signal, and Col. Williams, have been taken, and that Gov. Ford has disbanded the troops.

From Mexico.—The N. O. Bulletin of the 1st inst. has received accounts from Vera Cruz to the 12th ult. The annual epidemic of the place had subsided, and there was little sickness in the neighborhood. No vigorous measures were in progress towards the threatened invasion of Texas, and it is difficult to understand what are the real intentions of the Dictator. A faint show of raising troops was manifested in some departments, but the bands, it is stated, melted away by desertion nearly as fast as they were collected.

There came by this arrival five of the Texan prisoners, who were recently released. Their names are: W. F. Wilson, W. A. Wallace, T. S. Tatum, W. Ryon, J. C. Armstrong. There still remain of these unhappy men, victims of pefidy, cruelty and cowardice, one hundred and twenty in the jails of Mexico. Most of them are at the Castle Perote. Their misfortunes appeal to the sympathies and justice of mankind.

Santa Fe Trade.—The new paper at Independence gives some useful statistics in relation to the Santa Fe trade of the present year. The Santa Fe companies during the last year imported in specie about $400,000, and in robes and peltries about $50,000. Four companies went out this year containing about 160 men, taking with them goods to the value of $300,000, and their outfit at that place cost about $36,000. Ninety-two wagons were in the companies. The trade this year is said to be much less than usual, owing to the fact that a large number of the traders failed to return from Santa Fe on account of the rains, high water and bad weather.

The editor says that if they were entitled to drawbacks on the articles exported by them, our traders would soon supply the entire trade of all New Mexico, and he urges the allowance of drawbacks, and the establishment of a port of entry at Independence for the accommodation of this trade. We see no good reason why drawbacks should not be allowed on goods exported by land as well as on those exported by water.

All this valuable branch of commerce would be cut off and ruined in the event of a war with Mexico. [St. Louis New Era.

Marine Disasters.—The Nassau (N. P.) papers to the 25th Sept., give an account of the loss of the packet-ship Fairfield, which sailed from New York for New Orleans on the 9th of that month. A few days after leaving port she experienced a heavy gale, in which the ship lost most of her sails. For four days previous to the disaster, Captain Johnson was not able to get an observation, and he scarcely obtained a good one during the passage.

The Fairfield had a full and valuable cargo, all of which it is feared may be considered a total loss. The vessel soon after she struck bilged and started her keel, when the boxes of goods worked out through the bottom of the vessel.

She had eight cabin and twenty steerage passengers, who remained at Abaco from the 17th to the 22d, when they were carried to Nassau, where they published a card of thanks to the captain for his seamanlike conduct, and his attention to their wants.

The bark Hebron, of Boston, Prince, master, from Turks Island, with a cargo of salt, when eight days out, sprung a leak on the 13th of September, in lat. 28 20, lon. 70, and was abandoned by the captain and crew, who took to their boat, and, after being ten days exposed to the weather, they succeeded in landing at Abaco. From the account given by Capt. Prince, (says the Nassau Gazette,) who arrived in one of the wrecking vessels on the 25th, their preservation may be considered providential. [Com. Adv.

The Health of the Country.—The interior of Tennessee and North Mississippi, bordering on the Mississippi, has been and is yet to a very considerable extent afflicted with an unusual degree of sickness. The diseases are generally fevers, which put on more or less a decided type of congestion. In some sections it has been unusually fatal. Immediately on the margin of the river, and for a few miles out, there is generally good health. The sickness extends parallel with the Mississippi down into Louisiana, and appears to be mainly located some miles back from the river.

Effects of the Flood.—Many of the bottom farms still lie a dreary waste; the fences, barns, stables, and out-buildings lie in promiscuous heaps of rubbish in the timber below, with confused heaps of cord-wood, trees, drift wood, and rubbish. A large number of fertile and most desirable farms are now nothing more than barren plains of white sand. This sand has been deposited to the thickness of many feet on the bottom fields, and renders them sterile and unproductive. This is the case with many farms in this County, St. Charles, and Warren, and we believe in all the Counties on the Missouri that have bottom farms. [St. Louis New Era.

Vermont Asylum for the Insane.—By the Eighth Annual Report, which is just published, this institution appears to be in a prosperous condition. The buildings have been enlarged this season, furnishing greater accommodations, and improving the means of classification; 232 patients have enjoyed its advantages the past year, 74 have been discharged, and 158 now remain. Of those discharged, 51 have recovered. The terms are fixed at $2 per week, or $80 per year, if the patient remain so long in the institution. Patients from other States are received on the same terms as those from Vermont. [Asylum Journal.

From Trinidad.—Papers to Sept. 24, state that there was trouble between the agricultural laborers in Trinidad, and their employers, in consequence of an attempt by the latter to reduce wages.

The British brig Capricorn arrived at Hamilton on the 15th of September, being in want of water and seamen; the mate had died of yellow fever and four of the hands were laboring under the same disease. The brig was put into rigid quarantine. She had on board as passengers four refugees from St. Domingo—one of them General Romano, who had made his escape while under sentence of death.

The Providence Journal contains a notice that application will be made at the next sesion of the Legislature of Rhode Island for an act of incorporation for an association, to be entitled the 'New York and Providence Steamboat Company,' with a capital of $300,000, for the purpose of constructing four steamboats to navigate the Sound as a regular line between Providenc and New York.

The Colonizationists are likely to succeed in raising the means to effect the proposed purchase of certain portions of the territory in Africa, between Cape Mount and Cape Palmas. The cost will be from $15,000 to $20,000. A gentleman of New York has proffered to be one of fifteen to raise the requisite sum in subscriptions of $1,000 each, and a gentleman of Pittsburg has given $1,000. The commerce of Liberia would be much improved by the consumation of this purchase, and it will have a great influence in breaking up the slave trade which is yet, notwithstanding all the efforts to suppress it, extensively carried on.

Florida, the New York Sun says, "is in a miserable languishing condition, from its being a territory; and its resources will never be developed until it comes into the Union as a State." Why are not the two north-western territories in a languishing condition? In Florida, settlers are encouraged by a bounty—in Wiskonsan and Iowa, they must buy what they would cultivate. The latter thrive vigorously; the former languishes! [Cin. Herald.

We are informed that on Monday afternoon, an Indian of the Tonawanda tribe, 24 years of age, accomplished the extraordinary feat of running ten miles, on the Cold Spring race course, in a few seconds less than one hour. This he effected without any previous training, and without any motive other than that of trying his speed and bottom, he having never before run over five miles at one time. Our informant states the he accomplished the feat without any apparent fatigue. After the race, a purse was made up to him by those on the ground. [Buffalo Gazette.

How many pounds of pork will a bushel of barley make? An English farmer says: The fatting of hogs is profitable, when a pound of green bacon, when it is first dried, is worth more than the tenth part of the price of a bushel of barley; for a bushel of barley is supposed, with good management and a good breed of hogs, to produce 10 lbs. of bacon.

SUMMARY.

There will be a greater number of houses built in Cincinnati this season, than any season heretofore; 1,500, including the northern suburbs. The increase of population for the last twelve months is estimated at seven thousand five hundren souls; and the present population 75,000.

Large and handsome American merino shawls, selling readily at five dollars, are manufactured in Blakely township, Penn., from Pennsylvania wool.

Mr. Walsh, in his last letter to the National Intelligencer, from Paris, after speaking of the riot and violence that attended the recent election in Greece, says that "in a church, where the ballot was held, a general exchange of blows was stopped by a rustic, who emptied a hive of bees in the midst of the combatants."

A son of Mr. Robert G. Shaw, one of the most eminent and wealthy merchants in Boston, has recently embraced the Catholic faith. He sailed for Liverpool in the Hibernia, on his way to Rome, where he intends to study for the priesthood.

William Quin was recently tried in New-York for the murder of Harriet Flatcher, and convicted of manslaughter in the fourth degree.

A newspaper is to be established at Willamette, in the Oregon territory, the materials for which are to be shipped at New York, to the care of Messrs. Ladd & Co, Oahua, Sandwich Islands. The people subscribed $645 for the purpose, and the Hudson Bay Company increased it to $800. [St. Louis Repb.

We learn from the Cincinnati Atlas that a fire broke out in that city on the 6th inst., which destroyed the Washington Brewery, a saw mill, a planing mill, and a part of the Fulton Bagging factory. Entire loss about $15,000—mostly insured. Two mechanics, Mr. G. Hemphill and J Jenks, who were engaged in the planing mill, were seriously burnt in endeavoring to save some of their tools.

The Editor of the Lagrange (Geo.) Herald states that a plot to murder him was recently defeated by timely discovery.

The frequent murders on the edge of Arkansas, and in the Indian country West of that State, would seem to require some legislation on the part of Congress to prevent such occurrences. These tribes of Indians should be well protected from the lawless whites, and life on the borders should be made more secure.

The Editor of the Concordia (La.) Intelligencer estimates the loss of Cotton this year in the lowlands of Arkansas, Mississippi, and those of the Concordia district in Louisiana, by the great overflow of the Mississippi River, at 139,105 bales, valued at $4,173,150. Other actual losses, such as injury to buildings, fences, levees, destruction of corn, stock, &c. are put down at $2,503,890—making a total loss of $6,677,000.

A man named Smith was executed by a mob in Missouri in August last. The ringleader and eight or ten others are now in prison for the deed, and may possibly share the fate of their victin.

It is said that a new and very rich Gold Mine has been discovered on the lands in the upper part of Moore county, N. C. The ore is said to be worth from $10 to $20 a bushel, so far as it has been examined. It is imbedded in a blue flint stone. One of the veins is twelve feet wide; but the richest vein is from eight to twelve inches wide.

A new and valuable discovery of Copper Ore has lately been made in Kickapoo county, Wisconsin, about twelve miles above Prairie du Chien, and six miles from the Mississippi River. The ore is said to be about seven per cent. richer than that found about Mineral Point, and from its appearance, it would yield about twenty per cent. pure Copper. About 2,000 pounds of the ore is raised daily, and the lode is proved for some distance ahead, and the mineral increases in quantity the farther they go. There is no doubt that the Mineral Point and Kickapoo country is a much better Copper region than the Lake Superior country, which is making so much talk just at this time.

"We understand that there has been a serious row at Quebec, among the Irish. It appears that on Wednesday last there was a procession and illumination, in honor of the liberation of O'Connell, and that in consequence of some parties having refused to illuminate, their houses were attacked, upon which the assailants were fired upon from the houses, and several of them wounded."

In Manchester (Eng.) there are fifty manufacturing houses, which furnish thirty miles of cloth per day.

In France several editors are Ministers of State; per contra, forty-seven are in prison for libels on the Government.

An attempt is making in France to work locomotive engines by compressed air.

In Boston an increase of $7,000,000 in the assessment value of property has been made this year, and the rate of taxation is of course less, being $6 on a thousand, instead of $6 50.

With a population of 3,000,000, Sweden has 160,000 distilleries, furnishing more than 400,000,000 gallons yearly.

During a severe storm of hail, which occurred a few days since at Havre, a lump of ice fell weighing three pounds.

The total revenue of the Prince of Wales, now three years old, (from the Duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster,) amounted, in the year ending 31st December last, to upwards of £73,100.

The money necessary to the establishment of the Asylum for the Insane in Rhode Island, has been subscribed.

The steamboat 'Potosi,' on her upward trip from St. Louis to Galena, burst one of her boilers at Quincy, by which three men were instantly killed and about twenty scalded. It was doubtless the result of gross carelessness.

A gentleman who was at Rochester at the time Mr. C. M. Clay spoke there, writes that he has declined to meet Gerrit Smith in public debate.

A Philadelphia correspondent of the Tribune, under date of Oct. 12th, says:—"The Grand Jury this morning brought into Court two true bills, one against John G. Watmough, ex-M. C. for riot during the Southwark disturbances, and Lewis C. Levin, Member of Congress elect from the First District, for misdemeanor in inciting to treason and riot! He will be tried probably week after next.

We have now entered the month of October, and can still congratulate our citizens at home and abroad on the continued excellent health of the city. The equinoctial gale occurred on Friday night last, continuing through Saturday and Sunday, and with it a very sudden change in the weather, which has been most bracing and pleasant ever since. We believe there is now as little danger (either for resident or stranger) of contracting illness in New-Orleans as in any spot in the Mississippi Valley. [N. O. Commercial Bulletin, Oct. 2.

Some time since we noticed the arrest of a man named John Haughy, with half a dozen aliases, on a charge of robbing Mrs. Wilson, in Baltimore County. After his arrest, circumstances arose to render a belief that the arrested man was an escaped murderer from New York. Officer Small went to New York to ascertain the particulars, and he yesterday returned, accompanied by the High Constable of Troy, with a requisition from the Governor of New York. The murder was committed about three years ago on the body of a German in Rensselaer County, and the High Constable has identified this man as the murderer. [Baltimore Sun.

Sixty thousand dollars of Municipality and Bank counterfeit Bonds were burnt in New-Orleans on the 1st inst. by the authorities, with appropriate ceremonies. This large amount of counterfeit money was found in the possession of Vincent Clark, lately deceased, who was arrested some eight months ago, and who was discharged from prison by order of the Attorney General, in consequence of his agreeing to make some developments that would materially aid the cause of justice.

An explosion lately took place in a rolling mill in Pittsburg, Pa., by which three men were dangerously scalded.

We learn from the Providence Journal that John Gordon, convicted at the March term of the murder of Amasa Sprague, was on Wednesday brought up for sentence, the Court having unanimously overruled the motion for a new trial. Judge Durfee, after an impressive address, sentenced him to be executed on Friday 14th of February next between the hours of 9 and 3 o'clock.

The steamer Knickerbocker left New York at 5 minutes past 6 o'clock, and although she had on only her usual moderate head of steam arrived at the dock in Albany at 15 minutes before 3, making the passage in 8 hours and 40 minutes.

The business of Calico Printing in the United States gives employment to one hundred and thirty-nine mills. These mills print weekly about 114,000 pieces, and supposing that they work fifty weeks in the year, the total quantity of calicoes produced by them in a year is 5,700,000 pieces of 32 yards each—which is about 28 yards to each person in the United States, white and colored, over the age of ten years.

Out of 223 tailors registered in the London Eastern and Western Unions, 123 are reported as having died of disease of the respiratory organs. This is rather curious, and the causes should be examined and ascertained, whether the leaning posture over the work in any way affects the breathing.

It is stated that there are in the mines of Siberia, no less than twelve thousand persons, Poles and refractory Russians, who have been sent there to toil out a miserable existence, by the Emperor of Russia.

A lady in this village, says the Concord (Mass.) Freeman, reduced to the verge of death by brain fever, whose case was considered hopeless by her regular physician, has been suddenly and unexpectedly restored to health by the application of cold water.

We see it stated in the Albany Cultivator, that Ireland contains only about 15,000,000 acres of land, which is under cultivation—about 4,000,000 more than the State of New York. Yet Ireland, with a population of more than 10,000,000 to support, exports annually more grain than the whole territory of the United States. It is also stated from recent surveys made in Ireland, that there are five millions of acres of good land capable of cultivation, which remain unimproved. It is also further stated that there are more than 15,000,000 of a like character in England and Scotland! So it cannot be supposed, notwithstanding the advance these countries have made in agricultural improvements, that they are as yet anything like what they may arrive at. [Banner and Pioneer.

Carelessness and Death.—A German woman, recently arrived in this country, was crushed to death on a canal boat near Massillon on Saturday morning. The woman was asleep on some baggage on deck, and was crushed by coming in contact with a bridge. Blame, says the Massillon Gazette, is attached to the Captain, who refused to let the woman go below deck to sleep.

Mere theologians are the greatest and narrowest of all egotists; they make God the free servant of their petty parish, and imagine that eclipses of the sun are sent only to shade and cool them on their way to church. [Jean Paul.

In prayer guard your senses; David prayed, "Turn thou off my eyes from beholding vanity." This may serve to explain the Arabian proverb, "Shut the windows that the house my be light."

A CARD.

The subscriber is anxious to collect all the facts or records to be obtained, which throw light upon the history and spirit of Sabbath-keepers both ancient and modern. He would therefore request any friends who may be able and disposed to aid in making such a collection, to forward him the information of which they are in possession. Copies of letters, extracts from church or family records, notices of books or pamphlets, copies of inscriptions on tomb stones, autographs, prints—indeed, anything calculated to assist one in judging of the characters of individuals, would be gratefully received. The loan of books, when the owner may wish to keep them under his control, or the plainest statement of facts, when one has little time to dress them up, will often be of great service. It is hoped that many will show their readiness to promote this object by furnishing what may be in their power. An opportunity to forward by some one visiting New York can generally be found. Address No. 9 Spruce street.

BETTER MOMENTS.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

My mother's voice! how often creeps
Its cadence on my lonely hours!
Like healing sent on wings of sleep,
Or dew to the unconscious flower.

I cannot forget her melting prayer
While leaping pulses madly fly,
But in the still, unbroken air,
Her gentle tone comes stealing by—
And years, and sin, and manhood flee,
And leave me at my mother's knee.

The book of Nature, and the print
Of beauty on the whispering sea
Give aye to me some lineament
Of what I have been taught to be.
My heart is harder, and perhaps
My manliness hath drank up tears;
And there's a mildew in the lapse
Of a few miserable years—
But Nature's book is even yet
With all my mother's lessons writ.

I have been out at eventide
Beneath a moonlight sky of spring,
When earth was garnish'd like a bird,
And night had on her silver wing—
When bursting leaves, and diamond grass,
And waters leaping to the light,
And all that makes the pulses pass
With wilder fleetness, throng'd the night
When all was beauty—Then have I
With friends on whom my love is flung
Like myrrh of wings of Araby,
Gaz'd up where evening's lamp is hung,
And when the beautiful spirit there
Flung over me its golden chain,
My mother's voice came on the air
Like the light dropping of the rain—
And resting on some silver star
The spirit of a bended knee,
I've pour'd out low and fervent prayer
That our eternity might be
To rise in heaven, like stars at night,
And tread a living path of light.

DOMESTIC SLAVE-TRADE—THRILLING NARRATIVE.

The occurrence narrated below took place at Wilmington, N. C., and is described by a correspondent of the Methodist Christian Advocate and Journal. Such scenes are frequently seen in our land. Who can read the account without feelings of deep indignation mingled with his pity for the sufferers, and without a strong resolution to exert himself for the removal of the evil?

"There are at Washington City, at Norfolk, at Charleston, and perhaps some other places in the old States of the South, slave markets, where slave dealers may purchase upon speculation such slaves as they can obtain, for the purpose of resale at a profit in the extreme South.

"As I went on board the steamboat I noticed eight colored men, hand-cuffed, and chained together in pairs, four women, and eight or ten children, of the apparent ages of from four to ten years, all standing together in the bow of the boat, in charge of a man standing near them. Of the men, one was 60, one was 52, three of them about 25, and one about 20 years of age, as I subsequently learned from them. The two first had children, the next three had wives and children, and the other three were single, but had parents living from them. Coming near them, I perceived they were all greatly agitated; and on inquiring I found that they were all slaves, who had been born and raised in North Carolina, and had just been sold to a speculator, who was now taking them to Charleston market. Upon the shore there was a number of colored persons, women and children, waiting the departure of the boat; and my attention was particularly attracted by two colored females, of uncommonly respectable appearance, neatly attired, who stood together, a little distance from the crowd, and upon whose countenances was depicted the keenest sorrow. As the last bell was tolling I saw tears gushing from their eyes and they raised their neat cotton aprons and wiped their faces, under the cutting anguish of severed affection. They were the wives of the two men in chains. There, too, were mothers and sisters, weeping at the departure of their sons and brothers; and there, too, were fathers, taking the last look of their wives and children. My whole attention was directed to those on the shore, as they seemed to stand in solemn, submissive silence, occasionally giving utterance to the intensity of their feelings by a sigh, or a stifled groan. As the boat was loosened from her moorings, they cast a distressed, lingering look towards those on board, and turned away in silence. My eye now turned to those in the boat; and although I had tried to controle my feelings, amidst my sympathies for those on shore, I could conceal them no longer, and I found myself literally 'weeping with those that weep.' I stood near them, and when one of the husbands saw his wife upon the shore wave her hand for the last time, in token of her affection, his manly efforts to restrain his feelings gave way, and fixing his watery eyes upon her, he exclaimed, 'This is the most distressing thing of all! My dear wife and children, farewell!' The husband of the other wife stood weeping in silence, and with his manacled hands raised to his face, as he looked upon her for the last time. Of the poor women on board, three of them had husbands, whom they left behind. One of them had three children, another had two, and the third none. These husbands and fathers were among the throng upon the shore, witnessing the departure of their wives and children, and as they took their leave of them they were sitting together upon the floor of the boat, sobbing in silence, but giving utterence to no complaint. But the distressing scene was not yet ended. Sailing down the Cape Fear river twenty-five miles, we touched at the little village of Smithport, on the south side of the river. It was at this place that one of these slaves lived, and there was his wife and five children; and while at work on Monday last his purchaser took him away from his family, carried him in chains to Wilmington, where he has since remained in jail. As we approached the wharf, a flood of tears gushed from his eyes, and anguish seemed to have pierced his heart. The boat stopped but a moment, and as she left, he bid farewell to some of his acquaintances upon the shore, exclaiming, 'Boys, I wish you well; tell Molly (meaning his wife) and the children I wish them well, and hope God will bless them.' At that moment he espied his wife on the stoop of the house some rods from the shore, and with one hand which was not in the hand-cuffs, he pulled off his old hat, and waving it towards her, exclaimed, 'Farewell.' As he saw by the waving of her apron, that she recognized him, he leaned back upon the railing, and in a faltering voice repeated, 'Farewell, forever.' After a moment's silence, conflicting passions seemed to tear open his heart, and he exclaimed, 'What have I done that I should suffer this doom? O, my wife and children, I want to live no longer!' and then the big tear rolled down his cheek, which he wiped away with the palm of his unchained hand, looked once more at the mother of his five children, and the turning of the boat hid her face from him forever. As I looked around I saw that mine was not the only heart that had been affected by the scene, but that the tears standing in the eyes of many of my fellow-passengers bore testimony to the influence of human sympathy; and I could as an American citizen, standing within the limits of one of the old thirteen States, but repeat the language of Mr. Jefferson, in relation to the general subject. 'I tremble when I think that God is just.' After we left Smithport, I conversed freely with all these persons; and in intelligence, and respectability of appearance, the three men who have thus been torn from their families, would compare favorably with the respectable portion of our colored men at the North. This is a specimen of what almost daily occurs in the business of the slave-trade; and I hesitate not to say, that there is not a Christian in the whole South who will refuse to unite with his brethren everywhere in the condemnation of, and in the most effective measure to extinguish, the evils of this nefarious traffic.

"Yours, in the bonds of the gospel, A. C."

WHAT MAKES THE DIFFERENCE?

Go into one family, and you will find all its members possessing a good degree of intelligence. They are able to speak of the condition of the heathen, and of the efforts that are being made for their benefit; of the wrong that the slave is compelled to endure, and of the sympathy that is being felt for him; of the onward march of truth; of the latest discoveries in the arts and sciences; of the condition of the church and of the prospects of the state. Go into another, and they have scarcely any intelligent ideas on any of these matters. They know how to manage their own affairs, but are living almost as ignorant of the world as if they were not in it. Do you ask what has made the difference? In answer, it need only be said, the first family have uniformly read a religious newspaper, while the other has never enjoyed the privilege. That tells the story.

The influence of a healthy and well-conducted weekly journal upon a family, when it is read year after year, can hardly be estimated. The amount of intelligence it imparts, the elevated love of moral sentiment it inspires, and the efficient pious action it produces, compensate a thousand fold for the sum it costs. And yet there are some religious families who think they cannot afford to take such a paper! They can afford to be in the fashion, they can afford the expense of a luxurious table, but cannot afford themselves the means of becoming intelligent and useful! If they would reflect a little, they could not but perceive that they cannot afford to do without it. Families there may be, whose means are so limited that they cannot well meet the additional expense of a couple of dollars per year, but it is doubtful whether their expenses could not in some other way be diminished with less loss, than to forego the advantages of a weekly religious paper. [Religious Recorder.

THE ORDER OF ODD-FELLOWS.

Some curious statistical details, illustrative of the present state of this extensive fraternity, were laid before the Grand Metropolitan Lodge, at its late anniversary meeting. It appears that on the 1st of April last, when the returns were made up, there were in England and Wales, 3,840 lodges, and 325,000 members, showing an increase of 450 lodges, and 23,000 members over the previous year's returns. The subscriptions for this year amounted to £352,583; the expenditure to £300,000; leaving a balance of £52,583, in favor of the association. The total amount of property belonging to the order (including pictures, flags, banners, lodge paraphernalia, official apparel, and various insignia,) was estimated at £700,000. Amongst the enrolled members are, 130 members of Parliament, 629 ministers of religion of various denominations, and 9,000 honorary members who make no claim upon the funds. If each member were to contribute only one-halfpenny each, it would amount to £34,126 a year. If they were to walk two and two, one yard asunder, the procession would extend 92 miles and 380 yards. If they walked three miles an hour it would take 30 hours and 14 minutes to pass any given spot—10,214 passing every hour. The chief item of expenditure consists of the charge for medical aid afforded to the sick and indigent of the order.

SAGACITY OF DOGS.—The dogs by the Nile drink while running to escape the crocodiles. When those of New Orleans wish to cross the Mississippi, they bark at the river's edge to attract the alligators, who are no sooner drawn from their scattered haunts, and concentrated on the spot, than the dogs set off at full speed, and plunge into the water higher up the stream. An Esquimaux dog that was brought to this country, was given to artifices which are rarely seen in the native Europeans, whose subsistence does not depend on their own resources—strewing his food round him, and feigning sleep, in order to allure fowls and rats, which he never failed to add to his store.

[Blaze's History of Dogs.

THE SPIRIT OF GAMBLING.—A pugilist named Shelton, after a day's pleasure at Hampstead, England, gambled away his money and clothes at pitch and toss, upon which he tossed with his companion to see which should hang himself, the survivor to have the money and clothes of the loser; the lot again fell upon Shelton, who actually borrowed sixpence to purchase the halter, and then fulfilled his engagement. A watchman came up at the moment and cut him down, for which service the poor fellow was knocked down by Shelton in the excess of his indignation for the interference. He was tried for the assault and deservedly sentenced to three months imprisonment.

INCREASE OF CRIME.—Within forty years, commitments for crime have increased in England from 5,000 to 31,000, more than six fold—four times faster than the increase of population.

In Scotland, the increase of crime in the same period, has risen from 89 to 3,884—forty-three fold, and has advanced twenty-five times faster than the population.

That this prodigious increase has occurred during a period of almost unbroken peace, amid great improvements in criminal legislation and prison discipline too, and notwithstanding the unparalleled efforts to diffuse education and religion—creates a problem of no easy solution.

It is stated, also, that the prevalence of crime in England is fourteen times greater than in France—that the educated criminals are to the uneducated, as two to one. Facts like these demand thorough investigation, and strongly urge every pious mind to reflection and prayer. [Bost. Recorder.

SINGULAR CURE OF CONSUMPTION.—The Natchez Free Trader mentions a case of a man who came there a few years since in a far gone consumption, and who, by abstaining from water, meat and fluids, has become a powerful and robust man. This is the first instance on record, probably, of a man becoming powerful and robust on such slim fare.

It is not improbable, says the Newburyport Herald, that the above may have been a case of real cure of that dreadful disease. Of the efficacy of entire abstinence from fluids of every kind in curing ordinary coughs and colds, we have been assured by physicians who have tried it. A common cold may be cured in three days by an entire disuse of fluids.

HURRY vs. DESPATCH.—No two things differ more than hurry and despatch. Hurry is the mark of a weak mind, despatch of a strong one. A weak man in office, like a squirrel in a cage, is laboring eternally, but to no purpose—and is in constant motion without getting on a jot; like a turnstile, he is in every body's way, but stops nobody; he talks a great deal, but says very little; looks into every thing, but sees nothing; and has a hundred irons in the fire, but none of them are hot; or, should one of them be hot, with that he only burns his fingers. [Christian Watchman.

SAVING SEED CORN.—No farmer should neglect to select his earliest ears for seed. For this purpose he must go to his field before the ears are ripe and he will know which are earliest.

FRENCH COLONY IN AFRICA.—The present possessions of France in Africa cost her from two to three millions sterling a year, and require 100,000 men. This is surely "paying too dear for a whistle."

In the parish church of Leeds, Eng., during the past year, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered 77 times, 194 sermons were preached, 1,460 chapters of the Bible were read, 1,800 Psalms were said and chanted, and divine service was performed 1,095 times.

[Felix Farley's Bristol Journal.

"PRAY WITHOUT CEASING."

When morning is rising o'er mountain and lawn,
And every thing waketh to welcome the dawn,
When far down the valley the mists fly away,
Arouse thee from slumber, arouse thee and pray.

And when the still noon in its beauty draws nigh,
And nature seems ready to languish and die,
Then halt on thy march in the heat of the day,
Then lift up thy thoughts to thy Father, and pray.

When evening descends like a spirit of peace,
And labor and tumult grow fainter and cease,
When night cometh down in her starry array
Then haste to the God of thy spirit, and pray.

Remember His goodness, whose hand has supplied
Each want of thy bosom, nor even denied
The smiles of His bounty to gladden the way;
Remember His goodness, and gratefully pray.

Oh, pray to Him always—in sorrow or joy,
When peace is around thee, or troubles annoy;
The light of His presence the storm shall alloy,
Or temper thy gladness,—then constantly pray.

A GOOD DAUGHTER.

A good daughter! There are other ministers of love more conspicuous than her, but none in which a gentler, lovelier spirit dwells, and none to which her heart's warm requitals more joyfully respond. There is no such thing as a comparative estimate of a parent's love for one or another child. There is little which he needs to covet, to whom the treasure of a good child has been given. But a son's occupation and pleasure carry him abroad, and he resides more among temptations, which hardly permit affection that is following him perhaps, over half the globe, to be mingled with anxiety, until the time when he comes to relinquish the shelter of his father's roof for one of his own; while a good daughter is the steady light of her parent's house.

Her ideal is indissolubly connected with that of his happy fireside. She is his morning sunlight and evening star. The grace, vivacity, and tenderness of her sex have their mighty sway which she holds over his spirit. The lessons of recorded wisdom which she reads with her eyes, come to his mind with a new charm, as blended with the beloved melody of her voice. He scarcely knows weariness which her song does not make him forget, or gloom which is proof against the young brightness of her smile. She is the pride and ornament of his hospitality, the gentle nurse of his sickness, and the constant agent in those nameless, numberless acts of kindness which one chiefly cares to have rendered because they are unpretending, but expressive proofs of her love. And then what a cheerful sharer she is, and what an able lightener of her mother's care! What an ever present delight and triumph to a mother's affection.

Ah! how little do those daughters know of the powers which God has committed to them, and the happiness God would have them enjoy, who do not, every time that a parent's eye rests upon them, bring a rapture to a parent's heart. A true love will almost certainly always greet their approaching footsteps, that they may alienate. But their ambition should be, not to have it a love merely which feelings implanted by nature excite, but one made intense and overflowing by approbation of worthy conduct, and she is strangely blind to her own happiness, as well as undutiful to them to whom she owes most, in whom the perpetual appeals of parental disinterestedness do not call forth the prompt and fond echo of filial devotion.—Dr. Palfrey.

THE NOVEL WRITER.—The literary trifler is of all triflers, the most to be commiserated, and the most to be despised. He prostitutes the graces of letters, and the Promethean fire of genius, if not to shameless vice, to open frivolity. Destined to soar upon lofty wing through the "highest heaven of invention," he crawls upon the earth, and makes companionship with the dull clod and the sluggish worm. He profanes that talent which God gave him to advance His glory, and to promote the interests of mankind. In his hands truth suffers, and falsehood is respectable. He must carry with himself a conscience ill at ease, and must go down to his grave with the heavy malediction upon his soul, that he has neither "added ardor to virtue, nor confidence to truth."

REVERENCE FOR THE AGED.—A gentleman was once passing through a village, and happened to see a poor, feeble old woman let her stick fall, and stand a moment in perplexity, not knowing whether she dared to stoop to pick it up or attempt to reach her home without it. Just by the spot where the accident happened, a group of boys were playing at marbles; some of them took no notice, others rudely marked the poor old woman's distress; but one kind-hearted lad threw down his marbles, ran to her assistance and helped her into her house. She thanked him, and said, "God Almighty's blessing be upon you, for your kindness to a poor old woman!" The gentleman saw and heard the whole, and made inquiry after the lad, in whom he felt deeply interested. He found that he was already in the Sunday school, and, in all probability, had there learnt the Scriptures, that inculcate reverence to the aged. From that time he had him instructed in writing and accounts at an evening school; when old enough assisted in apprenticing him, and in course of time had the satisfaction of seeing him a respectable and flourishing tradesman.

I recollect his mentioning the circumstance to his wife as soon as he came home; he then said he thought that boy discovered the rudiments of a good character, and that he should be greatly disappointed if he did not turn out one whom it would be a credit and satisfaction to have put forward in life: after years fully proved that his opinion was correct. This, and some other circumstances led the gentleman to make many remarks on the treatment the aged should receive, which deeply impressed my mind, and which I endeavored to preserve.—Exchange paper.

REFLECTIONS.

"Look on her work! but look the more
On her unwearied heart,
And put aside the chamber door
That doth the daughter part
From that dear mother, who before
Taught her this cunning art."

If anything more is necessary to demonstrate the unmitigated evils of a monied monopoly, whose pecuniary resources are exerted in continual efforts to oppress the poor—the requisite proof is found in the relentless cruelty, and the remorseless, cold hearted policy which England is at this day pursuing towards the poor. We may talk as much as we please in this country about the evils of monopolies, and the many and acknowledged wrongs which result from unorganized labor; but a single glance at the mother country will convince the most incredulous, that the evils we now experience—whatever may be the apprehended fiat of the future, are but shadows when compared with theirs. Well, indeed, may humanity shudder while avarice, grasping at ALL, disregards health, happiness, and LIFE itself, while all the potent instrumentalities of a sagacious and systematized policy of oppression are operating daily to the destruction of the physical and mental capabilities of its victims, the subversion of nature, the brutalizing of humanity, and encouragement of vice. In a late report to the House of Commons on the condition of the working classes of Great Britain, a picture of wretchedness is exhibited which, in its variety and depth of coloring, is truly appalling. Our better sympathies would fain lead us to that benevolent and gratifying conclusion that the picture

"Is but fancy's sketch—"

that the horrifying details of destitution, misery, vice, and death, so thickly and appallingly grouped on every page of that revolting instrument—the mirror of Christian cruelty and civilized barbarity—are indebted for their enormity, rather to the fair prerogatives of fiction than to the integrity of irrefragible fact

The following condensed statement from the Mark Lane Express—an English agricultural periodical of great merit—will be perused with mournful interest. How true it is that

"Man's inhumanity to man
Makes countless millions mourn."

Nottingham has a population of 50,000.—Within the town, which consists of 11,000 houses, there are from 7,000 to 8,000 built back to back. When the cholera raged, many rows of houses were found to be placed upon drains, which were shallow, and simply covered with the boards of the sitting-room floors. These, when shrunk by heat, allowed obnoxious smells to rise. The health and morals of the residents suffered greatly from the state of their dwellings. Liverpool population consists of 230,000. There are in the borough of Liverpool 7,862 inhabited cellars, dark, damp, confined, ill-ventilated, and dirty. These cellars contain one fifth of the working classes, being 39,000 persons, and of the whole population they contain one seventh. There are 2,270 courts, in which there are six or seven families, and few of these courts have more than one outlet. Manchester population, 20,000. It was ascertained that twelve per cent. of the working population live in cellars. There are of that class 128,232 persons, of whom 34,676 live in cellars.—In Salford there are 49,991 of the working classes, 3,335 of whom dwell in cellars. It is stated that of 57,000 dwellings of the working classes, which were examined, 18,400 were ill furnished, and 10,400 scarcely comfortable.—In Bury the population is 20,000. The following statement of the condition of 3,000 of the families of the working classes in this place is most revolting. In 773 houses they slept three to four in a bed; in 207 they slept four to five in a bed; and in 78 they slept five to six in a bed! This awful statement must rouse the honest and religious indignation of every Englishman.—Bristol, population, 120,000. Of 1,250 families, consisting of 20,000 persons 2,800 families have but one room; 630 houses are without water, or are supplied with bad water. Newcastle-on-Tyne, population 64,600. The examiner of this place reports as follows: In many parts the dwellings are close, dirty and miserable, without order or comfort, whole families inhabiting a single room, and living in an atmosphere totally unendurable. The mind cannot picture a state of greater destitution or misery.—Maine Cultivator.

"What does Philosophy impart to man
But undiscovered wonders. Let her soar
E'en to her proudest heights—to where she caught
The soul of Newton and of Socrates,
She but extends the scope of wild amaze
And admiration. All her lessons end
In wider views of God's unfathomed depths."

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location, thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y. The fall term will open on WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 14th, under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

"THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD."

PUBLISHED AT NO. 9 SPRUCE STREET.

VOL. I. NEW-YORK, FIFTH DAY, OCTOBER 24, 1844. NO. 18.

The Recorder.

"YE ARE MY WITNESSES."

The following article was prepared by an intelligent and pious Israelite, who has within a few mouths past made a public profession of his faith in Jesus Christ, and received baptism at the hands of a Christian minister. We commend it to the candid and prayerful reading of every friend of God's ancient covenant people. It contains several idiomatic expressions, in which the reader will recognize a native German speaking the English language, and which we have thought best to give in their original form.

"REMEMBER THE SABBATH DAY TO KEEP IT HOLY."

One of the greatest schisms which was ever made among Christians since the foundation of the church, was made through the abrogation of the Sabbath. And it is as surprising as fatal, that the Reformers of the church have overlooked this important subject. Their inadvertency was the cause that the fourth commandment, which begins with the word remember, became forgotten, even in the Protestant church, excepting by a remnant of Baptists, who still observe the original Sabbath, as well as the original Baptism, and are therefore called Seventh-day Baptists, or, especially in England, Sabbatarians. This latter name is chosen for a very good reason by that denomination, since those who keep Sunday cannot be called Sabbatarians, or Sabbath-keepers.

The ordinary objection hereagainst is, that the Sabbath is not forgotten, but changed. But I shall sufficiently prove, that it is both forgotten and changed. The Sunday, according to their acknowledgment, was instituted in commemoration of our Saviour's resurrection; and of course they cannot say they keep it also in commemoration of God's resting after the creation of the world, because this is to be kept on the seventh day. And if they would assert, that they can keep it in commemoration of both, I ask, Why do they not keep the Sabbath which the Lord has instituted and sanctified, and declare that they keep it also in commemoration of the resurrection, which they suppose took place on Sunday? Or, is keeping the first day obedience to that law which requires our keeping the seventh?

It is also unmanageable to say, that the law requires only a seventh part of the week, and leaves it to us to determine what part that shall be; for God himself hath determined that for us, as every one may see from the following passages, Gen. 2: 3, "And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because that in it he had rested from all his work which he had made." Exodus 20: 10, 11, "But the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," &c. From these it appears, that it is not true for men to say, it is enough that some time be devoted to the worship and service of God; for that must necessarily have been, had there never been a fourth commandment in the world. The Lord has positively commanded to keep the seventh day holy. I do not say, that this commandment forbids us to worship the Lord also on other days of the week, but it forbids us to work on that day which the Lord has sanctified and appointed for rest.

Another absurd objection frequently made by even religious people is, that the seventh day is the Sabbath which was to be kept by the Jews in the old dispensation, but it was to be changed in the new dispensation. In this respect I will compare them with the Jews. There are some Jews who do not deny altogether the Divine Message of Christ; but they believe that he is only the Saviour of the Gentiles, not of the Jews—and so they still live in expectation of another Messiah. But are they not at a loss, if we ask them what passage in the Scripture speaks of two Messiahs—one for the Jews and one for the Gentiles? Yet are not Christians, who make the last-mentioned objection, in the same condition, if we ask them where in the Scriptures two Sabbaths are mentioned—one for the Jews and one for the Gentiles? One verse from the Prophet Isaiah is sufficient to prove that the Gentiles are bound to keep the same Sabbath which the Jews still observe—"Also the sons of the stranger, that join themselves to the Lord, to serve him, and love the name of the Lord, every one that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and taketh hold of my covenant." Isaiah 56: 6. And he proceeds—"Even them will I bring to my holy mountain, and make them joyful in mine house of prayer; their burnt-offerings and their sacrifices shall be accepted upon mine altar; for my house shall be called a house of prayer for all people." It is true, that the Sabbath is in two passages enforced upon the Jews, but this does by no means discharge the Gentiles from their duty to observe it. The first of these passages is in Exodus 31: 16, 17—"Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the Sabbath, to observe the Sabbath, throughout their generations, for a perpetual covenant. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel for ever; for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day he rested and was refreshed." In the previous verse, the Sabbath is especially commanded to the Israelites; but the seventeenth verse describes the reason of this commandment, viz. because God rested on the seventh day after the creation of the world. But in what respect does or did this event concern the Jews more than any other part of mankind? Do not Gentiles stand on the same level with them, in respect to their being a part of God's creation? Have they not as much interest in the creation as the Jews?—In the second passage, the Sabbath is enforced upon them by a consideration of their redemption from Egypt, Deut. 5: 15. But if we would draw the conclusion out of this passage, that no other nation is bound by the fourth commandment but that which was delivered from the bondage of Egypt, we could just as well draw the same conclusion from the first commandment to the last, because they were given to the same nation which God brought out of the land of Egypt, with the declaration, "I am the Lord thy God," Ex. 20: 2. But would not the question arise here, by the order of succession above mentioned, if God is also the God of the Gentiles, or only of the Jews?—and the answer succeed, according to the Apostle, "Yes, he is the God of the Gentiles also." Rom. 3: 29.

Again, it is certain, that Christ has not abrogated one of the ten commandments; on the contrary, he enforced them, as every one may see from Matt. 5: 17—20. And did not he and his Apostles keep this law punctiliously and precisely? Does not the Apostle James say, "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all?" James 2: 10, 11.

But the main question is, Who changed the Sabbath? The Scripture has not hidden it from us, that such a heretic should arise, who should think to change times and laws. We have a plain prediction of the Antichrist in the prophetical writings of Daniel, ch. 7. In the 25th verse we find this remarkable passage: "And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall think to change times and laws, and they shall be given into his hand, until a time and times, and the dividing of time." Here we find a literal fulfilment of this prophecy, viz. in that the Pope hath abrogated the Sabbath, and instituted the Sunday. That the Pope was Antichrist was indeed the general doctrine of the first Reformers every where. The Apostle Paul, in his epistle to the Thessalonians, also describes him "whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved;" 2 Thess. 9: 10. He says, also, "For the mystery of iniquity doth already work; only he who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way." Wherefrom it appears, that the time of his coming was near, in the days of the Apostle. And that he has come, there is not the least doubt, and has done all things which the prophet foretold, viz. to change times and laws; he abrogated the Sabbath-day, which God had instituted, and instituted the Sunday, Easter, Good-Friday, &c., which also many of the Protestants, especially in Europe, still observe. It is remarkable, that they prefer human tradition before the commandment of God; and instead of keeping the Sabbath, which they are obliged to keep, they observe a multitude of feasts, which are merely traditions of men. I do not call upon the Roman Catholics to renounce their feasts and embrace the Sabbath; for if I converse with them, I must begin with the second commandment, according to order, before I come to the fourth; and as I ask here, by what authority the Sabbath was changed? so also I must ask them first, by what authority the worshiping of images was instituted? But they will not believe that Antichrist is the author of both, because they do not believe that he has yet come. To the Protestants, however, who believe and profess that the Anti-christ has come, we may say with the Apostle: "But we are bound to give thanks always to God for you, brethren beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth: whereunto he called you by our Gospel, to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word, or our epistle." 2 Thess. 2: 13, 14, 15. Do not forsake God's commandment, and follow the traditions of men. Christ reproved the Scribes and Pharisees for transgressing God's commandment, through their own traditions; Matt. 15: 3. How much more will He reprove you, on the day of Judgment, if you who are bought with His atoning blood, transgress the holy commandment to follow human traditions? The Lord said, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy;" and consider that Christ said, "For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law," Matt. 5: 18. Does this sentence leave the least room to say, that the Sabbath was to be changed after His resurrection? Is it not absurd to say, the resurrection of Christ has abrogated the Sabbath, whilst you celebrate the day of his resurrection, and profane the day on which he rested even in the sepulchre? My dearly beloved brethren, do not persist in your error, but acknowledge it, embrace the truth, and enjoy the blessings of the Sabbath day which the Lord has appointed for rest, and blessed and sanctified from the beginning of the world. He has not only blessed the seventh or Sabbath day itself, but He has also blessed those who keep it holy, saying, "Blessed is the man that doeth this, and the son of man that layeth hold on it; that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and keepeth his hand from doing any evil; Is. 56: 2. And what the Lord hath blessed, is blessed for ever. That you may embrace the truth, and enjoy this blessing, is the wish of your sincere brother,

CHARLES ALLERSHIMER.

Religious.

FROM THE REMAINS OF REV. JOHN BROWN.

O what must Christ be in himself, when he sweetens heaven, sweetens Scripture, sweetens ordinances, sweetens earth, and even sweetens trials! O what must that Christ be in himself?

Anything that I know about religion is this—that I have found weakness and wickedness about myself, and grace and mercy and loveliness about Jesus.

I have been looking at him these many years, and never yet could find a fault in him but what was of my own making; though he has seen ten thousand faults in me. Many comely persons I have seen, but none so comely as Christ; many a kind friend I have had, but none like Christ, in loving kindness and tender mercies.

I am sure a poor worthless wretch he hath had of me; but a precious, superlatively precious Christ I have had in him.

How amazing that a rich derservant of hell should get such a Christ!

If you or I get a crumb from the Master's table, what a wonder of sovereign mercy it is.

Compare your mercies, your visits, not with the wishes of your soul, but with the deserts of your sins.

Though we should get but one smile of His countenance in a whole year, what a mercy to those who deserve all the year throughout to be tormented in the lowest hell.

No doubt I have met with trials as well as others, yet so kind hath God been to me, that I think, if God were to give me as many years as I have already lived in the world, I would not desire one single circumstance in my lot changed,—except I wish I had less sin.

Though I have not been left to commit gross crimes, yet He and I know the outrageous wickedness of my heart.

I have served many masters, but none so kind as Christ.

O how astonishing that the Spirit of God should enter into our vile hearts contrary to our strivings. Even so it seemed good in his sight. Let praise flow, forever flow.

I am sure Christ may say of me, "These sixty years this wretch hath grieved me."

O what a miracle to see me, the arrant rebel, sitting on the throne with Jesus!

Never grudge either purse or person for Christ, I can say this, that I never was a loser by any time spent, or by any money given for him.

We should reckon him a madman that would throw away a father's estate, but he is much more foolish who throws away a father's God:

O how strange that rivers of pleasure should be provided for the murderers of God's Son, and the contemners of his word.

Ah, how many of us called Christians are led like beasts, by the head; and how few like saints indeed, are led by the heart.

I am but weak; but it is delightful to find one's self weak in everlasting arms; O how much do I owe my Lord!

There are wonders in heaven, and wonders in the earth; but the least part of redemption work is more wonderful than them all.

O how God hath exemplified that law in his conduct towards me: "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink;" and in so doing I hope he hath heaped hot melting coals upon my head.

So far as ever I observed God's dealings with my soul, the flight of preachers sometimes entertained me; but it was Scripture expressions which did penetrate my heart and that in a way peculiar to themselves.

It might be written on my coffin, "Here lies one of the cares of Providence, who early wanted both father and mother, and yet never missed them."

O, sirs! dying work is serious! serious work indeed! and that you will soon find.

PRAYER ANSWERED.

Alas, that there should be those who hesitate to believe in answer to prayer. Yet such are to be found, even among professing Christians. Who could have expected this, when the sacred records present the wonders it has accomplished, and holy men in every succeeding age have borne testimony to the kindness of their Heavenly Father, in answering their requests? Let us seek to remove unbelief by the statement of a fact, more powerful by far than an argument.

In 1842, a Christian minister, not unknown to the writer, having a large family dependent on him, and held in esteem by his brethren, was visited with alarming illness. Quinsy had placed him in circumstances of extreme danger. Medical attendants could give no hope; hours and days elapsed, and death appeared all but certain. The medical friend of the minister, indeed, declared his conviction that in a few hours he would be in another world.

It was the privilege of this minister to be associated with a beloved fraternity of pastors in the district who met monthly at each others' houses for conference and prayer. At their meeting at the precise crisis of the disease a spirit of deep Christian sympathy prevailed, and special prayer was solicited for their afflicted friend. On that day the medical man had twice seen his patient, and had proposed to pay another visit in the evening, when, as the last hope, he proposed to make an external incision in the throat, an experiment, he said, certainly doubtful in its result.

In the afternoon, as the afflicted minister sat with his wife suggesting various matters to be arranged "after his death," he began for the first time for about thirty hours to feel a sensation in his throat, for a time he could scarcely believe the fact; he at length avowed his conviction; and his poor wife was overwhelmed with feeling; it had indeed become certain, and he was shortly after enabled to swallow. Having become delirious through debility, he was placed in bed, and when his medical friend came in the evening, to his astonishment he was asleep. The surgeon lifted up his hands and exclaimed, "Well, now I believe in the existence of miracles."

A few hours elapsed, when the minister awoke, and speaking to his wife on the subject, he declared his conviction that his unexpected deliverance was in answer to the prayers of his assembled brethren. It was even so; early in the morning, a venerable ministerial brother called to inquire into the circumstance which had excited so much sympathy. He said that the utmost anxiety had prevailed among the brethren, that it was proposed that an extra half hour should be devoted to special prayer on his account, and that brother A—— especially presented the most ardent petitions, inspiring a confidence of success in every bosom, such as was seldom felt. At the exact time this prayer was being presented to the throne of God, the divine "hand was stretched forth to heal."

O, the omnipotence of prayer! May we be found more frequently in its exercise, realize its blessedness, and cordially recommend its practice to our friends. [Bap. Memorial.

From the "Voice of Jacob."

"DAYS OF OLD."

MOUNT SINAI.

"And the LORD said unto Moses, Lo, I come unto thee in a thick cloud, that the people may hear when I speak unto thee, and believe thee for ever." Three days were to intervene of solemn preparation, that the chosen people might be able to bear the presence even of the cloud which veiled the glory of the Eternal, the Holy One of Israel. What days were those in the camp! No more doubting, no more murmuring, no more disbelief in the divine mission of Moses. He, the prophet of the Highest, whom some had been ready to stone, was now looked on with reverential awe, and his every step followed by thousands of anxious eyes. Minutely were his commands given, and unreservedly obeyed. Before them towered the hill of Sinai; and what was there in that rugged mount to attract every gaze, to thrill every heart, to cause a tremor in every knee? Moses was setting bounds about it, making it a consecrated, a peculiar thing, that neither man nor beast might touch under penalty of instant death.

There was little now to distinguish one family from another throughout the tents of Israel; one mighty influence embraced them all; individual peculiarities of character were for the time lost in the one great feature of nationality. Israel was gathered together, and how had the Eternal addressed them, through Moses? "Now, therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculair treasure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine: and shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation." Israel felt on that day as one man; man, called to hear the voice of the Supreme, Eternal God!

Yet were there degrees in the intensity of feeling excited; and such a heart as Jabin's could scarcely find room for the expansion of which it was conscious. The third morning found him at the tent door, his face bathed in tears of hope, and joy, and holy awe. Jabin loved the Lord his God: for had not that glorious hand delivered him and his people from a sore bondage, and thus far led them towards the fulfilment of every promise made to Abraham, and to Isaac, and to Jacob? Had not that powerful arm cut Rahab and wounded the dragon, and made the depths of the sea a way for the ransomed to pass over? Were not their frames cherished with bread from heaven, their lips moist with pure water from the stony rock, and their souls filled as with marrow and fatness, while they praised him with joyful lips? Yes, Jabin loved the Lord, and exceedingly rejoiced that His glory was magnified.

But lo! while the early sun throws far and wide the vivid beams of his uprising splendor, the highest and the brightest spot in view becomes suddenly dark. O how unlike the darkness of Egypt was that darkness of Sinai! Under the one evil angels were present, to terrify, to torture, and to dismay; within the other was shrouded the resplendent majesty of the Lord of heaven and earth. But thunderings, such as never before rocked the world, lightnings in the living blaze of which the sun sickened and vanished, with such a trumpet sound as caused the heart of man to pause in its life throb, so exceedingly fearful was the grandeur of its unearthly tone—these bespoke the approaching presence of the Eternal—who could abide that hour?

In the deep silence, stepping softly, upborne by a strength not their own, the whole multitude of Israel left the camp, led forth by Moses, to the nether part of the mount. Shall mortal hand dare trace what followed? No; with reverence we take up the word of inspiration to relate it. "And Mount Sinai was altogether in a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in a fire; and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a great furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly. And when the voice of the trumpet sounded long, and waxed louder and louder, Moses spake, and God answered him by a voice. And the Lord came down upon Mount Sinai on the top of the mount; and the Lord called Moses up to the top of the mount, and Moses went up." Prostrate on their faces, doubly terrified at the departure of him whose divine mission they had more than once dared to question, in death like stillness the children of Israel awaited the sequel of this unutterable scene; and then the thunder ceased to roll, and the lightning's fitful flash gave place to the one broad sheet of living fire that wrapped the holy mount, and rising over canopied the earth, piercing alike the closed eyelid and the mantle's fold that would have veiled it; and pentrating the inmost soul with irresistible light; and the voice of the Eternal was heard by man, and the Almighty Lawgiver proclaimed the law of His commandments; the sublime code of Israel's King who liveth for ever and ever.

Did not Jabin feel the terrors that caused every heart to quake? He did, but his soul clave unto the Lord, for protection, as it were, even against His own awful Majesty. To no other people were such fearful manifestations vouchsafed, because among nations no other was so near and dear unto the Lord. The words of the law fell upon his ear; they also sank into his heart. To him the scene was not one of transitory excitement, but an entering into covenant with his God. What, from henceforth, could be the voice of man to Jabin, what the clamor of his own passions, the murmuring tones of his own unbelief? He had heard the voice of God, and all else must be to him as the rustling of leaves in a summer's gale. When the multitude, overcome with the terrible glory, removed and stood afar off, Jabin was among them, but his heart removed not. Its language was that which David long after recorded as his own, "O how I love thy law!"

A HEAVENLY CHART.

I was one day standing in the shop of my master, behind the counter, when an old sailor entered, and looking seriously at me accosted me thus; "Young man, I want a chart!" "Yes sir," I replied, "you shall have one; do you want St. George's, or the Bay of Biscay, or round Ireland, or the Mediterranean, sir?" "Stay, young man, stay!" said the old sailor, "youth is always in a hurry. I want a chart, but don't want either one you have mentioned: they are useless to me. I want a chart which shall guide me to heaven, for I have lost my old one. Now, young man, do you understand me?"

I immediately conjectured that he wanted a Bible: so I took down a few and showed them to him; and he selected one, evidently much pleased at my readiness to serve him; inquired the price and paid the money. After a few moments' pause, he turned around suddenly and asked me whether I understood that chart? I told him that I could read, and did so often. "Of that," said the old man, "I have not the least doubt; but recollect that is not sufficient; you must have it in your life and conversation; before you will receive any benefit, you must love this chart, you must make it your sole guide through life's maze, and in entering into the dark and narrow, and to many thousands, dreadful strait of death, you will find it beneficial—then it will be found indeed a treasure and joy. [London Pilot.

WHERE SHALL I GO LAST OF ALL?—A Hindoo, of a thoughtful, reflecting turn of mind, but devoted to idolatry, lay on his death bed. As he saw himself about to plunge into the boundless unknown, he cried out, "What will become of me?" "O," said a Brahmin, who stood by, "You will inhabit another body." "And where," said he, "shall I go then?" "Into another." "And where then?" "Into another, and so on through thousands of millions." Darting across this whole period as though it were but an instant, he cried, "where shall I go then?" Paganism could not answer, and he died agonizing under the inquiry, "Where shall I go last of all?"

A WISE CORRECTOR.—A certain person who was remarkable for the cheerfulness as well as the fervor of his piety, being once in company, when a gentleman occasionally embellished his discourse with the names of the devil, duce, &c., and at last took the name of God in vain. "Stop sir," said the pious man, "I said nothing while you used freedom with the names of your own master, but I insist you shall take no freedom with the name of mine."

It is almost as difficult to make a man unlearn his errors, as his knowledge. Mal-information is more hopeless than non-information; for error is always more busy than ignorance. Ignorance is a blank sheet, on which we may write; but error is a scribbled one, on which we must first erase. Ignorance is contented to stand still with her back to the truth; but error is more presumptuous, and proceeds in the same direction. Ignorance has no light, but error follows a false one. The consequence is, that error, when she retraces her footsteps, has farther to go, before she can arrive at the truth, than ignorance.

A Virginian king, when the Europeans had fixed a lock on his door, was so delighted to find his subjects admitted or excluded with such facility, that it was from morning till evening his whole employment to turn the key. We, among whom locks and keys have been longer in use, are inclined to laugh at the American amusement; yet I doubt whether I have a single reader who may not apply the story to himself, and recollect some hours of life in which he has been equally overpowered by the transitory charm of some trifling novelty. [Dr. Johnson.

It is the common custom of the world, to follow example rather than precept; but it would be the safer course, to learn by precept rather than example.

TIME FOR SPECIAL PRAYER.

There is no time at which prayer may safely be neglected. Whether individuals are in adversity or at ease, surrounded by temptation or comparatively free from it, they have sufficient occasion to look to God for help and protection. Whether the church is at peace or in the midst of discord, whether it rejoices or mourns, there is need enough of earnest prayer. But there are times when Christians are specially called upon to offer special prayer. Such a time is the present, when the great mass of professors are at ease in Zion, when the interests of vital godliness languish, and the love of many waxes cold. It is by the effect which the sight of such things produces upon us, that we may determine our real condition. When refreshing showers are enjoyed, the water-courses are all supplied; but it is only when long-continued and severe drought has visited a land, that we can determine which are the living and perennial streams. How is it with you, fellow Christian? Does the present declension of religious interest lead you to more fervent prayer, or does it encourage you in a state of indolence?

ATTENDANCE UPON PUBLIC WORSHIP.

It is a very easy thing to be uniform in attending upon the worship of the sanctuary, if the habit of doing so be once formed. But it is often difficult to attend at all, when no such habit is maintained. Multiplied are the inducements to regularity in this thing. Its influence upon ourselves, in bringing us under the means of grace, deepening in us a sense of obligation, and encouraging us to live a pious life, ought to lead to regularity. Its influence upon other professors of religion, in inducing their attendance, making the place attractive to them, and preventing any excuse for their neglect of it, ought to have weight. Its influence upon the unconverted, in showing them that the house of God is pleasant, his worship a source of satisfaction, and his command imperative, should not be forgotten. Its influence upon society at large, in promoting kindness and sociability, neatness and taste, respect for Christian institutions and Christian duties, should be considered. In whatever light it be regarded, its benefits are multiplied and great. Whoever neglects regularity of attendance upon the public ordinances of the house of God, practically denies their importance, robs himself of what should be esteemed a privilege, leads to carelessness in others, and opens the door to a multitude of evils which it is difficult afterwards to correct. Neglectors of this duty ought to consider, that what may be done at one time may be done at all times, and what one may do may be done by others. Thus carelessness and neglect might become the characteristic of a community, through the influence of a few individuals.

BREVITY.

We find in the Boston Olive Branch, what purports to be a sermon from the text, "In the multitude of words there wanteth not sin." The preacher claims to have forty-nine arguments to support the charge of the text against a multitude of words. He contents himself, however, with mentioning only three. The first is, that they are a sin against time, since they not only waste the speaker's time, but steal that of the hearer. The second is, that they are a sin against patience, since nothing tries it more than a long talk about nothing. Thirdly, they are a sin against truth, because a multitude of words conceals the truth if there was any, and deceives if there was none. If these three arguments fail to convince offenders of their sin, we think it would be useless to add the remaining forty-six. Speakers ought to know, that after the third or fourth repetition of a thing, most audiences begin to suspect they have heard it before; and it is no very great compliment paid them, to persist in practically denying this. Good taste, therefore, as well as good morality, would seem to require a man to stop when he gets through—in other words, to be brief.

PENNY-A-WEEK.

The first Penny-a-week Bible Society established in Scotland, originated with a young man, who proposed, at the close of a missionary meeting, that a Penny-a-week Society should be formed, to aid in translating and circulating the Scriptures in the oriental languages. After some delay, a public meeting was called, and a committee appointed to prepare a constitution. At a meeting two weeks afterwards, eight hundred subscribers were reported. Six weeks later there were two thousand subscribers. The meetings of the society were numerously attended and interesting; district societies were formed for the purpose of obtaining more subscribers; and the influence of the society increased until it raised four or five thousand dollars annually. This affords a happy illustration of what lasting good may result from a single suggestion, when carried out to its legitimate results.

HOME MISSIONS AND SLAVERY.

Some weeks ago, an application was made by the Georgia Baptist Convention to the American Baptist Home Missionary Society, for the appointment of James E. Reeve, as one of its missionaries. The application was accompanied by the assurance that Mr. Reeve was a slaveholder, and that his appointment was wished "so much the more, as it would stop the mouths of gainsayers," who doubted whether a slaveholder would be appointed, even if desired by those who supply the funds. The Board has at length acted upon the question, and decided, that in view of a resolution passed at the last anniversary of the Society, it is not expedient for the Board to introduce the subject of slavery or anti-slavery into their deliberations, nor to entertain applications into which they are introduced; and that, therefore, they are not at liberty to entertain the application for the appointment of Mr. Reeve.

This is rather a round-about way of deciding the question, and is nearly equal to no decision at all. The Georgia Convention wants to know whether a slaveholder can be appointed; and the Board decides that it cannot entertain an application into which the subject is introduced. Thus nothing is said about whether slaveholding disqualifies a man for the duties of a missionary or not.

A NEW CHURCH.

A Seventh-day Baptist Church was recently constituted in Pendleton, Niagara Co. N. Y., with about twenty members, all of whom, including the preacher, had embraced the Sabbath within a few months. It is easy to find, in many places, an equal number of persons, who wish, or profess to wish, that the whole church would return to the Sabbath of the Bible, so that they might act according to their convictions of duty, without the danger of being singular. But it is not common to meet with a company willing to separate themselves from all old associations, and to raise an independent standard for the truth. The sight of now and then such a company is encouraging, and affords a most gratifying evidence of the power of the truth. In the history of nearly every Sabbath-keeping church in this country, may be found facts which can only be explained by admitting the powerful working of God's Spirit upon the hearts of men, convincing them of duty, and urging and encouraging them to the discharge of it. Such is acknowledged to be the case in regard to the church in Newport, in Piscataway, and in several other places. There are few persons who rightly estimate the powerful influences which hinder the increase of Sabbath-keeping churches. Many of the avenues to wealth and popularity are shut against those who refuse to observe the popular day of rest, and strictly observe another day. The consequence is, that large numbers of those who have been educated in the observance of the Sabbath, and who are fully convinced of its claims, fall in with the commonly-received notions, and follow the multitude. Their places have to be supplied by those who forsake other communions to join with us. The continuance and increase of the churches, in such circumstances, is a just occasion of wonder and thanksgiving. We rejoice in the organization of this church at Pendleton, because it is another proof that the truth is able to overcome all opposition, and will prevail.

CHARLES ALLERSHIMER.

On our first page will be found a communication over the signature of CHARLES ALLERSHIMER. Presuming that our readers would feel interested in having some account of his life, and of the means by which he was brought to believe in Christ as the Messiah, we present them with the following:—

Mr. Allershimer was born in Creglingen, kingdom of Wirtemberg, Germany, Dec. 10, 1810. He was the youngest son of very pious Jewish parents, by whom he was sent to a school where he received instruction in the Mosaic religion, in reading and writing Hebrew and German, and in the common branches of a good education. He was very strict in observing the Mosaic and Rabbinical laws, and was fond of reading the Old Testament with the various commentaries in the Hebrew language. His father died when he was 19 years of age, leaving him, with a brother and two sisters, a small property. But he did not incline to follow the business of his father, who was a cattle dealer, and therefore betook himself to a relative living some thirty miles distant, with whom he learned a trade, which he followed for six years.

Having heard of the fortunes made by many persons in America, he left Germany for this country in June, 1837, and landed at New York in September following. At landing he could not speak English, and had neither relative nor acquaintance. He met a German, however, who could speak English, and whom he hired to go with him in search of employment. He failed to find employment which suited him, and was compelled to commence peddling cutlery. Afterwards he obtained a situation in a fur factory, which continued for two years. When this failed, he was compelled to engage again in peddling for some four years.

The occasion of Mr. Allershimer's becoming interested in Christianity was this: After having been some time in this country, a gracious Providence led him to a friend with whom he had been acquainted in Germany, and whom he was greatly delighted to see. This friend told him that through the grace of God he had been brought to believe in Christ. Mr. Allershimer answered, that he was under a great mistake, if he supposed the Gospel to be the Word of God. To this his friend replied, that he could prove out of the Old Testament that Jesus Christ was the true Messiah, if he would converse with him. It was agreed that they should converse together about the matter. After many lengthy conversations, light began to break in upon his mind; and on one occasion, after reading the 53d chapter of Isaiah, Mr. Allershimer confessed his belief that Jesus Christ was the Messiah, who had suffered and died for our sins. His friend prayed with him, and the refreshing dews of grace nourished the seed which had been sown. Soon afterwards, Mr. Allershimer openly professed his belief in Christ as the Saviour of sinners; whereupon his Jewish friends became very angry; told him of the grief it would occasion his brother and sisters to hear that he had forsaken his religion; and said that they should consider him as dead. These things made a deep impression upon his mind; and he struggled for two years against the powerful convictions of his mind. At length it pleased God, last spring, to direct his steps to a church where a sermon was preached to the Jews, by a missionary to that people. After the sermon, he had a conversation with the preacher, and told him what his trials and belief had been for two years. The next week the missionary called upon him, and spoke with him about the duty of being baptized. After a severe struggle with himself, he determined that he would be baptized, come what might. Accordingly, in April last, he was baptized at a Baptist Church in this city, and became a member of the body of Christ. His own words are, "I can now sing with the Psalmist, 'I sought the Lord, and he heard me, and delivered me from all my fears.' 'May the Lord God, which gathereth the outcasts of Israel, gather others to him, besides those that are gathered unto him.'"

It may be well to add, that Mr. Allershimer is now living in New York, where his fervent and consistent piety has secured him many friends. His refusal to live upon the bounty of any religious society, has put to silence the common charge of his Jewish brethren, that money leads to a change of belief; while his conscientious observance of the Sabbath has drawn towards him the favorable regard of many Jews, over whom he exerts a healthful influence.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

Brother R. C. BOND, of Virginia, writes that he is still laboring in the field to which he was appointed, traveling often upwards of one hundred miles a week, and preaching from four to six times, in addition to other ministerial duties. The prospects of the usefulness of his mission are flattering; and while he looks to God for success, he asks the prayers of the church that his labors may not be in vain in the Lord.

ITEMS OF JEWISH INTELLIGENCE.

We are indebted to the October number of "The Occident, and American Jewish Advocate," for the facts contained in the following items.

CHIEF RABBI OF ENGLAND.—There is now a prospect that this office, which was vacated about two years ago by the death of Rev. Mr. Hirschell, will soon be filled by a man every way qualified for so important a trust. There are four candidates for the office. The election takes place throughout Great Britain on Sunday, 13th of October.

MEETING OF GERMAN RABBIS.—This meeting took place at Brunswick in June last. The number in attendance was not so large as was expected. Among the results of the convention was, a declaration that the oath of a Jew requires no more than an appeal to the name of God, and a confirmation of some former decisions about marriage, divorce, &c. A commission was appointed to revise the Jewish law of marriage, on the plea that the laws of various States overrule the Jewish law in many particulars. A commission was also appointed preparatory to a new liturgy, to whom the questions, among others, are propounded, whether it is necessary and desirable to retain the Hebrew language in Divine service, whether the dogma of the Messiah should be retained in the prayers, whether the organ should be introduced into Divine service. The eighth item of business was, "the appointment of a commission to prepare the question of how a compromise may be effected between the doctrine of the Sabbath and the actual observance of it."

OUTRAGES ON THE JEWS.—Sad outrages were committed upon the Jews in Gesecke, a town in Westphalia, in May last. It seems that a young Israelite was induced to change his religion, and was baptized contrary to the will of his parents. Afterwards he was sent to the Gymnasium, as it was reported, at the expense of some ecclesiastics. He was called home by his father, who soon sent him away without any body's knowledge. This led to various reports; and some one wrote an anonymous letter to his former teacher, full of invectives against Christianity. Influenced by this, a mob attacked the house of the young man's father, broke the windows and shutters; and afterwards extended their zeal to other Jewish habitations, demolishing with hatchets the doors, furniture, and goods, cutting open and scattering the beds, &c. Similar scenes were exhibited in one or two neighboring villages. The subject is undergoing judicial investigation.

PERSECUTION AT TARNOW.—At Tarnow, in Gallica, the old charge against the Jews, of offering a human sacrifice as a pascal offering at the feast of the Passover, was raised in April last. A lad had run away, and his master professed to fear, that he was concealed for this purpose among the Jews. Hereupon all their houses were searched in a most annoying and vexatious manner. The boy was found in a neighboring village, to which he had fled. The case is to be brought before the imperial Court of Chancery.

HOSPITAL AT JERUSALEM.—The money for this proposed institution is not all collected yet. Dr. Philippson has received about $25,000, of which the Rothschilds gave 100,000 francs. Its establishment is urged in view of what Christians are doing in that place.

BISHOP ONDERDONK, of Pennsylvania, about whom so much has been said within the last few months, ceased to be a bishop of the Episcopal Church on Monday, 21st inst,

END OF THE WORLD—AGAIN.

Great excitement has prevailed among the Adventists for some days past. Tuesday of this week was the time fixed upon for the appearance of the Lord; and as this day drew near, their extravagancies increased. In Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, their meetings have been of such a nature as to draw crowds of evil-disposed persons, and make it necessary for the civil authorities to interpose. The tabernacle at Boston was closed, after having been disturbed by a mob, and one of their places of worship in this city was treated in much the same manner.

It was represented that certain individuals among them had received direct information, while in trances, that the advent would take place on the 22d instant, at 3 o'clock in the morning. This led to a considerable discussion as to the propriety of going into the open fields for the purpose of receiving Christ. In this city, however, it was generally thought best to remain in their own houses, unless distinct intimations to the contrary were given. But of those in Philadelphia, some hundred left their houses on the 21st, and proceeded several miles into the country, giving and throwing away their goods and money. In almost every place the excitement among them is intense, and leads to the abandonment of business, disposing of property, and breaking up all of the arrangements of society. What course will be pursued, when this set time is fully past, remains to be seen.

A NEW ASSOCIATION.—A Campbellite preacher named W. H. Wharton, has recently proposed to establish a community which shall be modeled after the first church at Jerusalem. We give the following outline of his plan, and leave our readers to judge how nearly it resembles the "model church:"—Christians are to associate together in companies of from 50 to 500, each family contributing all it has towards a common fund. Out of this they are to build a large palace, with suits of rooms sufficient to accommodate the whole—so arranged that there would be a common kitchen and a common table. To this would be attached workshops, and a large domain, under a common overseer. Here all could work at the vocations wherein they were called. All would be fed and clothed out of the common stock. Out of the surplus, schools and libraries would be established. At the end of each year, a dividend would be declared and paid to each man, according to the stock and labor contributed.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.—In a certain neighborhood, remote from any church, and poorly supplied with religious privileges, several brethren established a weekly prayer meeting. This effort, which was commenced with trembling, resulted in the conversion and baptism of some twenty persons. Let the brethren who seldom attend meeting because of its distance from them, think of this fact, and imitate the example here presented to them. The promise is, that where even two or three are assembled together in the name of Christ, he will be with them, to bless. With such a promise, what excuse can be given for neglecting "the assembling of yourselves together, as the manner of some is?"

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.—The issues of this society during the last five months, have averaged upwards of forty thousand copies per month. Twenty-three thousand dollars have been bestowed in foreign grants within the last year. The whole Bible, neatly bound, is now furnished for twenty-five cents, and New Testaments for six cents. Surely the expense of the Scriptures can be no apology now for neglecting to read them.

MISSIONARIES TO THE INDIANS.—The Banner and Pioneer, of Louisville, Ky., informs us that two young ladies, accompanied by a third who has heretofore been engaged in the missionary field, recently started for the Far West, with a view of laboring as missionaries among the Indians. The Indians certainly have a claim upon the Christian community which can not be easily met. Their necessitous condition, their multiplied injuries at the hands of the whites, and the encouragements to labor among them, ought to give weight to their appeal.

PASTORAL VISITS.—The following piece of advice has been for some time circulating among the papers. It is always seasonable, however, and we commend it to the attention of those whom it may concern:

"When your minister calls to make you a friendly visit, receive him without ceremony. His time is precious, and he cannot well afford to wait for you to change your dress, perform your toilet, and put things to rights. He calls to see you, not your clothes. And do not weary him with your apologies. He would much prefer to hear you speak of your moral concernments. And if you invite him to sit at your table, give him precisely such food as your family would have if he had not visited you. And improve your time while he is with you, in conversation upon such subjects as tend to increase your knowledge and happiness. Preachers are men, and they know that people have their affairs to see to; and if your minister is a man of common sense, and finds that you put yourself out on his account, he will call no more, lest by so doing he should put you to some inconvenience. Be kind enough to see him just as you are, when he calls; he will like you the better for it."

REVIVALS.—A colporteur laboring in North Carolina reports one place at which meetings for prayer, without any preaching, were continued during a week, and resulted in the hopeful conversion of some fifty persons. In another place, a series of meetings lasted fifteen days, with equally encouraging results.

THE BIBLE IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—A lengthy report from Dr. Reese, Superintendant of Common Schools for the City and County of New York, was recently read before the Board of Education. It contains some startling facts. It appears that the Commissioners and Inspectors of the 14th ward, decided in July, 1843, that the reading of the Scriptures should be dispensed with in the schools of that ward, and that the decision has been enforced ever since. By this means the Bible is excluded from thirty-three schools, extending their influence to about 40,000 children. The American Republican says:

> The Secretary of State, the legally constituted head of the Department of Common Schools for the State of New York, sustains Dr. Reese in the following decisions:
>
> 1st. The Bible, without note or comment, is not, nor can it be, in any point of view, regarded as a religious sectarian book.
>
> 2d. The exclusion of the Bible from any of the public Schools, by Commissioners, Inspectors, or Trustees, solely on the ground of its being sectarian, is unjustifiable and illegal.
>
> 3d. The 12th section of the act of 1844, prohibits any exclusion of the ordinarily received and authorized version of the Scriptures, without note or comment, either Protestant or Catholic, on the ground of sectarianism or otherwise.

THE BAPTISTS.—The numerical strength of this denomination has increased rapidly for a few years past, and is so great at the present time as to lay upon them heavy responsibilities. According to the Baptist Almanac for 1845, there are 540 associations, 9230 churches, 6377 ministers, and 707,942 communicants. This estimate leaves out some associations, which would swell the total number to more than 800,000. The number baptized during the year past was 89,589.

RELIGION IN FRANCE.—The doctrines of the Gospel seem to be making rapid progress in some parts of France. Attachment to the Catholic faith is much weakened, and in many cases totally destroyed. The result of this, among a people so enthusiastic as the French, must be to lead to the adoption of some other faith. It is said, that in hundreds of villages, the people earnestly desire Protestant teachers, even though they are nominally Roman Catholics. France is now thought to be an inviting field for missionary labor.

MYSTERIOUS.—It is stated in the London Patriot, that Mr. Gaillard, a converted Roman Catholic Priest, has suddenly and mysteriously disappeared from Geneva, the place of his residence. His renunciation of popery had excited the rage of the Catholics, and the general opinion was that the Jesuits had carried him off to immure him in the dungeons of some monastic establishment. The authorities of Geneva were endeavoring to discover the authors of the plot.

THE CHOCTAWS.—The Christian Observer informs us, that Rev. Mr. Hotchkin, of the Choctaw Mission west of the Arkansas, was in Philadelphia a short time since. He reports that the last year has been one of unusual and uninterrupted religious prosperity in the congregations and schools of that mission. More than one hundred have been added to the churches within twelve months, including some of the most intelligent and influential men, as well as some of the most abandoned. The condition of that people is improving in every respect. They are cultivating the arts of civilized life, expending large sums for education, and have among them well disciplined and gifted men, qualified to fill any station. Mr. Hotchkin takes with him a reinforcement of seven or eight assistant missionaries.

CONSECRATION OF BISHOPS.—On Sunday morning last, the ceremony of consecration, according to the rites of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, was solemnized at Christ Church in Philadelphia. The consecration sermon was preached by Bishop Chase, of Illinois, from the text, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil." The form of ordination was then read, for the following persons: Carlton Chase to the Episcopate of New Hampshire, Nicholas H. Cobb to the Episcopate of Alabama, Cicero S. Hawks to the Episcopate of Missouri.

AN APT REPLY.

We have read of an unassuming minister of the Gospel, who was asked by a talkative professor, "Do you think you have any religion?"—and who replied, "None to speak of." But the following anecdote of Bishop Griswold, which we find in the account of his life, lately published, is more to the point, and has withal a local habitation and a name:—

"During his residence in Bristol, a minister with more zeal than discretion, became impressed with the conviction that the Bishop was a mere formalist in religion, and that it was his duty to go and warn him of his danger, and exhort him to 'flee from the wrath to come.' Accordingly, he called upon the Bishop, very solemnly made known his errand, and forthwith entered on his harrangue. The Bishop listened in silence, till his self-constituted instructor had closed a severely denunciatory exhortation, and then in substance replied as follows:—'My dear friend, I do not wonder that they who witness the inconsistency of my daily walk, and see how poorly I adorn the doctrine of God my Saviour, should think that I have no religion. I often fear for myself that such is the case, and feel very grateful to you for giving me this warning.' The reply was made with such an evidently unaffected humility, and such a depth of feeling and sincerity, that if an audible voice from heaven had attested the genuineness of his Christian character, it could not more effectually have silenced his kindly-intending, but misjudging censor, or more completely have disabused him of his false impression. He immediately acknowledged his error, begged the Bishop's pardon, and ever afterwards looked upon him as one of the distinguished lights of the Christian world."

General Intelligence.

GREAT HURRICANE AT BUFFALO.

Buffalo was visited, on Friday night last, with one of the most terrific gales ever known to the inhabitants of that section. The weather had been for several days lowery and rainy, but without much wind. About twelve o'clock on Friday night, however, the wind began to blow; and within four hours the gale raised the water of the Lake so as to overflow all the low grounds of the city, much of which was thickly inhabited. The water was higher than ever before known, and floated off many houses. The destruction of property was immense. Buildings were blown down; lumber, fences, and wood, scattered about; and canal-boats, sail vessels, and steamers, were all thrown into confusion, many of them being on dry ground. One rail-road track was broken up for nearly half a mile. The docks were torn in peices; and flood-wood, wagons, and carts were lying in confused heaps, with cows, horses, and other domestic animals.

But the most deplorable effect of the gale was in the destruction of human life. The basements of many of the buildings flooded were inhabited, and in most cases the inundation was so sudden as to render escape impossible, and their occupants were drowned. Some were washed from the boats on which they belonged, and others were killed by the falling of buildings. Whole families were thus taken unexpectedly, and engulfed in the common ruin. The number of persons lost is variously estimated, some accounts placing it at near 200; about fifty bodies of men, women, and children, had been picked up among the ruins at the last accounts.

At Rochester, the gale was very severe on Friday night, unroofing houses, prostrating fences and trees, and doing much injury in various ways.

In the vicinity of Toronto, Canada, five schooners went ashore, one of which had on board 6500 bushels of wheat. A steamboat went ashore near Ogdensburg, and fears are entertained for many others on the St. Lawrence and the Lakes.

Singular Accident.—A few days since an athletic colored man, connected with the society of Union Methodists of this city, while in the act of exhorting his brethren, with a deal of earnest gesticulation, fractured his right arm just below the attachment of the deltoid muscle, by the violence of the muscular contraction. Surgeons pronounced the bone to be in a healthy condition, and that the case was without a parallel in the history of surgery.

FOREIGN—12 DAYS LATER.

The steamship Acadia arrived at Boston on Sunday last, bringing news to the 4th inst.

The Queen has been enjoying, in rude health, the pleasures of her mountain residence in the Highlands of Scotland. She was expected to return home in a few days.

O'Connell, whose movements are recorded with a degree of interest not inferior to those of royalty, has left the Irish metropolis for his mountain home. The bearing of O'Connell, since his release, has been unusually temperate. Conciliation is now his cue. This new system of tactics is beginning to tell favorably upon a large class of persons who stand in a neutral position—upon those who have no strong feeling in favor of or against the extreme parties.

Rumors prevail that the Government meditates the adoption of strong measures to put down the machinery which keeps the repeal movement going. The subdued tone of the Irish leader is attributed by some to his desire to ward off such a blow. Others imagine that by lowering his demands, without compromising his consistency, he will rally round him many who think that, short of a repeal of the union, measures for the amelioration of Ireland could be adopted with safety, and even with advantage.

Rumors have been current for some days, that a new treaty has been recently entered into between Brazil and the British Government. Nothing positive is known as to the terms.

The treaty entered into between England and France, for giving up offenders that take refuge in either country, has been carried out in the person of Jacques Besset, charged with fraudulent bankruptcy, who has been taken into custody in London, and sent to Paris.

Railway Traveling.—There is a growing feeling in favor of cheap traveling, and the directors begin to think, as the Government and the public have long thought, that a large amount of business with moderate fares will ensure a better return to the proprietors than high fares with a limited traffic. Accordingly, cheap trains are now encouraged by the railway boards, and, for a trifle, thousands of persons are in the habit of visiting their friends, or seeing the sights of places hitherto considered inaccessible except to those above the laboring classes. This movement, combined with the more temperate habits of the people, cannot fail to produce a marked improvement in the character and tastes of what has justly been termed the "bone and sinews of society"—the working population.

Visit of the French King.—The visit of Louis Phillippe to Windsor is a fruitful topic for the speculations of politicians on both sides of the Channel. Amongst the topics which are likely to occupy the attention of the Sovereigns of England and France, the most prominent, it is believed, will be the condition of Spain. French intrigue succeeded in driving Espartero into exile, but matters have worn a more alarming face since his expulsion. Indeed, it is clear, from what is passing around, that the country is on the eve of an outbreak; and one, in all probability, of a desperate character.

The Overland Mail.—The most prominent feature in the intelligence is, that a treaty had been concluded between the United States and the Celestial Empire, based upon the same principles as dictated that between England and China—in which America will enjoy all the advantages which Great Britain, by her arms, secured, after an immense outlay of blood and treasure.

Repudiation Denounced at the British Court.—It is very commonly rumored in the city, that it is the intention of Government to exclude from the Court, and from the Ministerial parties, all the foreign Ministers or Charges d'Affaires, whose Governments have not faithfully fulfilled their engagements with their creditors in this country. Such a proceeding would place the United States Representative in a very embarrassing and unenviable position.

Dreadful Loss of Life near Sunderland.—Accounts from Sunderland give a notice of an explosion in a coal-pit at Haswell colliery, about ten miles from Sunderland, which has caused the destruction of ninety-six human beings! It is said that at the time of the accident there were a hundred persons in the pit, and that only three or four have been saved.

Further Particulars.—This calamity appears to have been more dreadful than we first anticipated. The number of men in the pit at the time of the explosion was nearly 150. Only one man, it is said, has escaped alive uninjured. Upward of 100 dead bodies have already been brought to the bank. It is utterly impossible to describe the dreadful anguish of the surviving relatives. One man was found unsinged, with his cap in his mouth; he had probably placed it there in order to prevent the foul air getting into his mouth. Several had their fingers closed in each other, and pressing on their mouths. Fifteen putters (boys and young men employed in taking the coals from the hewers to the bottom of the shaft) were in one lump—all clasped together. They had their clothes on prepared to ascend. When working they are nearly naked.

The state of the relatives beggars all description. Each cottage had its dead father or brothers, or both.

Three men at the bottom of the shaft were saved: the shock was so great that the roof near them had fallen down and so blocked up the passage as to stop the further progress of the bad air. These men thus providentially rescued were the first who brought the intelligence to the bank: the explosion was not heard by those outside the pit. The men when asked the cause of the dreadful accident say that the state of the pit must have been known to some persons; but it does not appear that any complaints had been previously made.

An equally disastrous explosion occurred twenty years ago at Wall's-end, about four miles from Newcastle-on Tyne. 101 perished on that occasion.

France and Morocco.—The papers announce the arrival at Paris of the Duke de Glucksberg with a treaty between France and Morocco. The Emperor stipulates that he will communicate to the French Government the names of the Moorish chiefs who invaded the Algerian territory; that Abd-el-Kader be outlawed throughout the African possessions of the Emperor and France; that he may be pursued by the troops of both governments, until expelled or captured; that if he fall into the hands of the French, he is to be treated with every respect due to his station; that Mogador island and the town of Ouchda be evacuated by the French; that prisoners of war be immediately exchanged; and that the ratification of the treaty be exchanged within two months.

Sweden.—Popular disturbances have been occasioned by the rejection of the measure of reform recently discussed in the Diet; and there were riots on the 28th and 29th of August. The method of their suppression was curious. The police hired a number of assistants, miners, day-laborers, and others, all of them tall and powerful men, who mingled with the crowd, and who not only inflicted summary punishment for every attempt to create disturbance, but also arrested the most conspicuous among the rioters. Among the prisoners, fifty-six in number, were two opera-dancers.

Novel Feat on the Thames.—A clown, named Barry, who performs at Astley's Amphitheatre, undertook, for a wager, to sail on the Thames, from Vauxhall to London Bridge, in a tub drawn by two geese. He performed the feat successfully on the 23d ult. It was done by Usher, the clown, about twenty years back.

A Girl's Leg Amputated while in a Mesmeric State.—Last week, a girl, who was affected with a swelling in her knee, had her leg taken off by a surgeon while in a mesmeric sleep. There is no doubt about the fact. Three surgeons were present—one operated, one assisted, and one watched the case. They all agree as to the fact, but two of them assert that she suffered pain, as there were twitchings of the nerves, &c. She herself is unconscious of having suffered any pain.

The Great Britain steam-ship, our readers will be pleased to learn, is on the eve of being relieved from her confinement in Bristol dock.

From China.—The facts given below are taken from an overland letter from Macao, dated 1st July. It will be perceived that this is another row, and not the one originating in the vane on the American Staff. We should no tbe surprised to hear that the trade was stopped by the next arrival.

A serious disturbance took place at Canton, beginning on the 15th June and continuing for several days. It appears that a Chinese was killed, and the Mandarins demanded life for life. A guard consisting of sixteen marines and fifty or more sailors had been stationed at the factories, to guard the lives of the foreigners, and Mr. Cushing was (on the 1st of July) about to proceed to Canton to institute an inquiry into the circumstances, and to endeavor to pacify the excited multitude. Many of the foreign merchants had left Canton with their treasures, books, &c., and the populace continued in a very excited state up to the end of June.

Severe Gale at Havana.—We learn from Capt. Wilkins, of the brig Titi, from Havana, that on the 4th and 5th instant, a dreadful hurricane was experienced at that place—about one hundred and twenty-five houses were unroofed, or otherwise injured, and about sixty Spanish "droghers" were sunk.

We also learn that the same hurricane was experienced at Matanzas, and out of twenty-six vessels in port at the time, but two rode out the gale in safety. A Spanish man-of-war brig was lost during the gale, near Havana—crew all saved with the exception of the gunner.

We learn from Capt. Churchill, of the ship Nathaniel Hooper, arrived at this port yesterday morning from Boston, that he spoke, on the 14th instant, the ship Ilzaide, from New Orleans, for London, who requested him to receive on board three wrecked seamen, two of them (Michael Driscoll and Henry Hoyt) believed to be the only survivors of a crew of fourteen persons belonging to the U. S. Revenue Cutter Vigilant, Capt. W. B. G. Taylor, of New Orleans, which vessel was blown from her anchors out of the harbor of Key West, on the 5th inst., during a gale, and capsized.

The above named seamen caught hold of a very small canoe which got loose from the schooner while bottom up; they there retained their hold for two days and nights, the sea continually breaking over them. When taken off by the ship Ilzaide, they were nearly speechless and quite exhausted.

The Dead-Letter Office.—This office at Washington, where letters are opened and read, the owners of which cannot be found, is full of curious interest. A writer in the Baltimore Sun says the money found in such letters is very great. The amount of monies received during the quarter ending the 30th of September last, is $4,470. In every case where money, good or bad, (or other valuables) is found in letters, it is carefully re-enclosed and sent to the postmaster of the place whence it was transmitted, with directions to that officer to use every effort in finding the writer of the letter, to whom he should deliver it, and obtain a receipt. In this way, about nine-tenths of the amount reverts annually to the owners. If the owners cannot be found within forty days, it is again returned to the Department, where it remains subject to the order of the owner at any subsequent period.

Canal Break at Black Rock, Oct. 19th.—About fifteen rods of Squaw Island, below Gelston's saw mill, are driven away, and the water in the harbor is consequently drained off. The repairs of the breach, &c. will cost $8,000 or $10,000.

Col. Webb and Mr. Rust.—Mr. Rust's claim on the editor of the Courier, on account of a judgment of $7,300, recovered for a libel in alledging that Mr. Rust was suspected of having been concerned in the robbery of Pomeroy's express, has been adjusted by an award of Gov. Seward, to whom the matter was referred by the parties, requiring Col. Webb to pay to Mr. Rust's attorneys $1000.

Great Increase of Correspondence.—Effects of Cheap Postage.—We sent off yesterday, by our special conductor, the largest letter and newspaper mail that ever left any office in this city for the Cunard steamers. The increase in correspondence, caused by our reducing the rate from 18 3-4 to 6 cents per letter, is truly incredible. This branch of the post-office business here has been almost abolished from want of patronage, while we receive and forward at least ten times as many letters for each packet as the post-office used to receive. We calculate the increase at about ten-fold, although we believe it is a little over.

The Great Fair at Paris.—A festival of the mechanics of France took place during the past summer in Paris. The Paris journal, 'La Presse,' estimates at half a million of dollars, the expenses of manufacturers in making an exhibition of their goods, and the sales of them at twenty millions of dollars; and at a profit of ten per cent. Thirty-nine hundred persons contributed to this exhibition. About three hundred thousand persons from the country visited the fair.

A writer in Chambers' Edinburg Journal gives an interesting account of this Fair. It would seem that in almost every article of an ornamental character, the French manufacture excels the English. The writer tells us that he saw at the Fair beautiful specimens of marble composed of plaster of Paris and alum; artificial diamonds and gems scarcely surpassed by nature herself; and meadow peat compressed and hardened into ornaments, like those made of embossed leather. His attention was also attracted by an apparatus for setting type, put in operation and managed by a female. In the manufacture of shoes, boots, carpets, laces, glass lamps, brushes, &c., the French artisans are unrivaled.

SUMMARY.

The locomotive Ontario, brought down the Reading Railroad, on Wednesday last, one hundred and fifty iron cars, fully laden with coal. The train was at least one third of a mile long, and the coal thus carried weighed seven hundred and fifty-nine tons—the aggregate weight of the coal and cars being the enormous amount of eleven hundred and eighty tons. The engine which performed the unparalleled feat runs upon six driving wheels, and, with the immense train attached, moved along at a rapid rate.

Two gentlemen of New Orleans met on the 10th inst., on the Metairie Race Track, to fight a duel, weapons broad swords; to stand at eight feet and advance. The affair was amicably adjusted without coming to blows.

The last accounts from the city of Nauvoo state that a manifesto had been issued by a portion of the Mormons, declaring the church dissolved in consequence of the difficulties connected with the successorship of the late Imposter, Joe Smith.

It is a somewhat remarkable, but interesting fact, says the Boston Transcript, that five of our popular and substantial Insurance Offices in State street have for their Presidents at this time, five practical mechanics, sterling men and active members of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association, all but one of whom have been in the government of that association, its President at this time, being of the number.

A fire occurred last Thursday evening in Troy, at the corner of First and Ferry streets, which consumed five or six houses.

Governor Letcher recently appointed a day of thanksgiving in Kentucky. He ought to have appointed a day of fasting and prayer, such an one as that recommended in Isaiah, where the yoke was to be put away, and the oppressed let go free.

A Norwegian settlement on Fox river, ten miles long and seven miles wide, and thickly settled, mostly with those who neither know nor care to know, the English language, has been wasted by famine and disease to a fearful extent. The details are affecting. What could be done for their relief was done. But the distress was great—and report says, that 100 died. [Recorder.

The Ithaca Democrat states that the Steamboat De Witt Clinton, owned in that village, which has run on Cayuga Lake for the past fourteen years, accidentally took fire on Wednesday night at her moorings, and was entirely consumed, with all her machinery and furniture. Only one person was asleep on board at the time, and he barely escaped from the burning wreck.

Mr. Ethan Burroughs of Ferrisburgh, presented us last week with a perfect monstrosity in the shape of a cabbage. When placed upon its face it covered a surface of 13 feet in circumference—measured around the solid head 6 feet, and weighed 33 pounds.

In the case of Rebecca Brand vs. Allison Ideson, recently tried for seduction, a verdict was given for the plaintiff of $2,500. The victim was a girl of fifteen, who had been protected by a Sunday school teacher.

Times of general calamity and confusion have ever been productive of the greatest minds. The purest ore is produced from the hottest furnace, and the brightest thunderbolt is elicited from the darkest storm.

If some persons were to bestow one half of their fortune in learning how to spend the other half, it would be money extremely well laid out. He that spends two fortunes, and permitting himself to be twice ruined, dies at last a beggar, deserves no commiseration. He has gained neither experience from trial, nor repentance from reprieve. He has been all his life abusing fortune without enjoying her, and purchasing wisdom without possessing her.

An Arkansas hero was lately convicted of horse stealing, and when the sentence had been passed on him, he took a survey of the court-room, and gave vent to his feelings after the following manner:—"Well, this is rather the briskest place I ever did see. Traveled fifteen miles this morning—stood an election, and unanimously voted by twelve men to be maintained at the public expense for ten years."

In Siam, the wats, ecclesiastical establishments—are the places of education for children. They are beautiful and attractive spots. With shade trees, and shrubbery, and flowers, and fountains of water, and cool and pleasant walks. On board the ship Patrick Henry, which sailed on the 6th inst. for Liverpool, were 100 bales of fine American Wool, which were selected in this country from our finest Saxony fleeces by a Scotch manufacturer, says the N. Y. Jour. of Commerce. For some of it, he paid as high as 60 cents per lb. The quantity was about 20,000 lbs.

In Baltimore, on Friday, as the family of Dr. Patterson, was sitting at dinner, a gun was heard, and something struck the window sill. On examination a ball was found, as if just fired. It was then recollected that the report of fire-arms had been heard the day before, and search being made another ball was found in the wall of the attic chamber. No cause can be assigned for this probable attempt at murder.

It was a truth, which the great Fenelon earnestly endeavored to inculcate upon the mind of his pupil, that ingratitude is to be expected from men; and that it must never interfere with our exertions to do them good.

The Morris Canal was sold on Monday, at public auction in Newark, under a decree of the Court of Chancery in New Jersey, says the Newark Daily Advertiser, at the suit of Wilhelm Willink, Jr., representing the holders of the original Holland Loan. It was struck off to Asa Whitehead, John J. Bryant, and Benj. Williamson, Esqrs., for one million of dollars.

A difficulty took place in Moyamensing between a young white man about 22 years of age, and a colored woman named Eliza Welsh, in the course of which the former drew a dirk knife and inflicted three severe and dangerous stabs upon the left breast of the latter.

Chinese Printing.—The Chinese have always done their printing on the stereotype system, never using separate types. The Register in relation to this subject says:

Whether the Chinese will ever abandon their stereotype system and adopt that of moveable types, is an interesting question. They are, it is true, exceedingly tenacious of old habits and customs. Yet we have seen with astonishment, during the period in which they were for the first time brought in contact with European improvements in the art of war, that they manifested the most eager desire to adopt them. They have learned more in the art of engineering and casting cannon, in this short space of time, and have learnt it more practically and more cheerfully, than the Turks have permitted themselves to learn in a century. We cannot therefore but augur important changes from the friendly intercourse which is likely to grow up between the most ingenious and the most industrious of Asiatics, and the European mind. The stationary character which has so long marked the people of China, there is every reason to believe, will be broken up, by the contemplation of European models of excellence, and we think many years will not elapse before the Chinese adopt the European mode of printing, and set their skilful artisans to cut punches on steel, which shall surpass in beauty everything that the Europeans have yet been able to achieve. Possibly within less than a quarter of a century, Canton may have its Wilson and Figgins and Caslon, and founts of type may become as much an article of traffic in the Empire as they are in England.

THE BLESSED.

"Blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it."

I saw young children playing,
And my heart was full of bliss,
For I know not 'midst the scenes of earth,
A lovelier sight than this.
Like rose hearts glowed each flushed cheek
With pleasure's richest hue;
And the warm blood lit the tell-tale brow,
Most eloquently true;
Then my thoughts grew bright with joyfulness,
And sweet words were on my tongue,
How blessed are the innocent!
How blessed are the young!
But a voice, (like low flute music,)
My wakened spirit heard,
"Yea, rather are they blessed,
Who keep God's holy word."

I looked on life more earnestly,
With all its checkered lot;
And saw how bitter weeds would spring,
Where flowers of love were not!
I learned to read the heart's deeps,
Where mines of feeling glow,
To give a purer light to life,
Or fill it up with woe.
Then softly spake I to myself,
"Ah, childhood's mirth is vain;
But how blessed are the loving,
When their love is met again!"
Yet still that deep heart music,
Like a whisper round me stirred;
"Yea, rather are they blessed,
Who keep God's holy word."

I saw how men were toiling,
All through their little day,
To win from earth the glittering wealth,
That often leads astray;
And my heart and eyes grew weary,
At this folly of mankind,
For I saw how gold grew dim
Before the brightness of the mind;
Then I sang aloud triumphantly,
What dazzled fancy taught,
"How blessed are the gifted,
With their dower of burning thought!"
But a shadow fell among the light,
And the music seemed a sigh,
When the world adored, the worshiped ones
Were called upon—to die:
Then I needed not that spirit's voice
To tell me how I erred,
For I felt that they alone are blest,
Who keep God's holy word.

THE SHEPHERD AND THE PHILOSOPHER.

Far from cities and academies, lived an old shepherd. The desire for riches never came to trouble his happiness; envy or ambition never entered his peaceful soul. Age had whitened his head, and long experience had made him wise. In summer's heat or winter's cold he took care of his flock and field; and contented with himself and others, he blessed heaven for his comforts, while his heart was filled with a calm enjoyment.

The prudence and uprightness of this old man had acquired for him a renown which had extended to the neighboring places, and even to a great distance from the village where he dwelt.

A profound philosopher, one of those who consume their days and nights in seeking for a pure moral by which to act, came one day by the sage, and with a gentle voice, said to him:

"Shepherd, whence hast thou obtained thy wisdom? Hast thou grown pale over books, and spent thy nights in study? Hast thou visited Rome and ancient Greece? Hast thou followed, in their vast researches, the geniuses of great men? Hast thou, toiling with adverse fate, wandered in distant countries, ploughed unknown seas, whose borders are unexplored, and culled healthful fruits from thorny trees? Hast thou been exiled, and employed thy leisure in instructing thyself in the laws, manners, and virtues of the people thou wert thrown amongst? Speak, shepherd, where hast thou obtained the wisdom, so much admired in thee?" The villager replied in a modest tone:

"Humbler and happier was my destiny. I have not walked in the glorious but arduous path of science; I have not consumed my days and nights in study; I have seen neither Rome nor Greece; I am ignorant of the languages; I know not the works, or even the names of those men whose geniuses have illuminated past ages; and I have not sought out unexplored regions. The little that I know, I have learned of the humble creatures by whom I am surrounded; nature has taught me through them.

"The industrious bee, whom I see every day collecting sweet nectar from the flower cups, makes me love work, and following her example, I finish properly my daily task.

"Can I neglect the care of the future, in the presence of the prudent ant? My dog, my faithful Azar, the most devoted friend of all his race, teaches me implicit submission and grattiude. Can one find a more touching model of maternal affection, than this hen who with her wings protects her trembling little ones?

"See the bird of the forest! eagerly he seeks in the bushes for the grain to nourish his family; joyous he carries to his children the food for which they are waiting in their aerial couch, in the nest constructed with so much care to hold his tender young ones. Can he not serve as an example to the father of a family? The same nature, which has shown to me the virtues I ought to practice, has made known the vices from which I ought to fly. I take care in conversation, to shun a haughty or important tone; for, say I to myself—We detest the owl with his awkward cross pomposity; I have learned to keep my mouth closed and my tongue chained; the noisy prattle of the magpie has given me a horror of loud and frivolous conversation.

"I see that people fly with fear from the serpent with the poisonous sting, and I say to myself—Beware of calumny, whose venom is more murderous still."

The philosopher replied:—

"Shepherd, thy renown is not undeserved. Without consuming thy life in long and useless studies, without leaving thy beloved country, without even losing sight of thy father's roof, thou hast acquired true wisdom.

"Nature is prodigal of useful lessons; but happy, oh, old man! happy are they who know how to profit by them like thee." [Miss Coleman.

AFRICAN FEMALES.

I take this opportunity (says Lander, in his records of Clapperton's last expedition) of expressing my high admiration of the amiable conduct of the African females towards me; in sickness and in health, in prosperity and in adversity, their kindness and affection were ever the same. They have danced and sung with me in health, grieved with me in sorrow, and shed tears of compassion, at the recital of my misfortunes. When a boy, and suffering from fever in the West Indies, women of the same race used to take me in their arms or on their knees; sing and weep over me, and tell me not to die, for that my mother would break her heart to hear the news; and, pointing to the ocean, they cheered my spirits, by saying that it laved the shores of England, and that it would shortly bear me on its bosom to my distant home. In fine, through whatever region I have wandered; whether enslaved or free, I have invariably found a chord of tenderness and trembling pity to vibrate in the breast of an African woman; a spirit ever alive to sooth my sorrows and compassionate my afflictions; and I never in my life knew one of them to bestow on me a single unpleasent look or angry word.

TRUE POLITENESS.

He who has a heart glowing with kindness and good will toward his fellow men, and who is guided in the exercise of these feelings by good common sense, is the truly polite man. Politeness does not consist in wearing a white silk glove, and in gracefully lifting your hat as you meet an acquaintance; it does not consist in artificial smiles and flattering speech, but in silence and honest desires to promote the happiness of those around you; in the readiness to sacrifice your own ease and comfort, to add to the enjoyment of others. The poor negro women who found Mungo Park perishing under the palm trees of Africa, and who led him to their hut, and supplied him with food, and lulled him to sleep with their simple songs, were generally polite. They addressed him in language of kindness and sympathy; they led him tenderly to their home, and did all in their power to revive his drooping spirits.

A poor drover was driving his beeves to market on a winter's day. The cattle met a lady in the path, and apparently unconscious of the impoliteness, compelled the lady to turn one side into the snow. "Madam," said the drover, apologizing for the rudeness of his herd, "if the cattle knew as much as I do, you should not walk in the snow." That driver was, in the best sense of the term, a gentleman, while many a young man, in Washington street or Broadway, with glove and cane, and graceful step, is a brute.

The man who lays aside all selfishness, in regard to the happiness of others, who is ever ready to confer favors, who speaks in language of kindness and conciliation, and who studies to manifest those little attentions which gratify the heart, is a polite man, though he may wear a homespun coat, and make a very ungraceful bow. And many a fashionable, who dresses genteelly, and enters the most crowded apartments, with assurance and ease, is a perfect compound of rudeness and incivility. True politeness is a virtue of the understanding and of the heart. It is not like the whited sepulcher, or like Sodom's far famed fruit. There are no rules for the exercise of this virtue, more correct and definite than those laid down in the New Testament. There is no book of politeness comparable with the Bible. [Rev. S. C. Abbott.

TO CHURCH-GOING SLEEPERS.

It is a fortunate circumstance that "Queen Bess," of England, was not born a little later. She would have found as much as she could well manage in keeping awake the sleepy in church, especially if she had happened to reign in America. The following was the form of confession every man who slept in the time of divine service was expected to make. Some such regulation would be an excellent thing at the present day.

Decimo Martii, 1564. } A confession to be made by John Apsland, of Witcham.

The said party shall, upon Sunday, being the 4th day of June next commencing, come forth of his seat in the parish church of Witcham, aforesaid, into the middle alleye there, immediately after reading the gospel, and there shall stand, and with a loud voice shall say and confess as followeth, namely:

"Good neighbors, I acknowledge and confess that I have offended Almighty God, and by my evil example you all, for that I have use to sleepe in the church, for which I am most heartily sorry, and I ask God and you all most heartily, forgiveness for the same, promising, by God's help, never to offend hereafter in the like againe."

And at the doing hereoff hee shall under the hands of the ministers and church-wardens, there personal certifie, together with these presents, upon Monday, being the 22d day of July next, at trinity parish church in Ely, and then and there receive such furthere order herein, as shall be appointed.

John Aspland hath done the penance prescribed, within the church, the date and year above written. Signed by us.

IMPORTANT DECISION—DISCHARGE OF A SLAVE.—The Boston Post of Oct. 17, contains a report of a Slave Case decided in that city by Chief Justice Shaw, of the Supreme Court, on Friday before, which is of more than ordinary importance.

It seems that Robert T. Lucas, a slave of Edward Fitzgerald, purser on board the U. S. frigate U. States, was in 1841, by a written consent of Mr. Upshur, Secretary of the Navy, received and entered as a landsman on board said frigate, at Norfolk, Va. The frigate sailed on a cruise to the Pacific, and was thence ordered to the port of Boston, where she arrived on the 3d inst. A writ of habeas corpus for the delivery of the slave was served on the master without the knowledge or authority of the former.

Two points were presented for discussion, viz:—First, as to the claim of the Commander of the Frigate to the service of the slave; and secondly, whether his having been brought involuntarily within the limits of Massachusetts, without the consent of his master, who was about to return to Virginia, the Court could interfere to set him free.

Judge Shaw decided that although Lucas was lawfully entered and employed as a landsman on board the frigate, the right of the commander to his services as a slave could not extend beyond the territorial limits of Slavery, and were at an end whenever the service to be performed took him out of these limits.

In relation to the second point, the Judge held that the master having voluntarily placed his slave in a situation in which he would be liable to be taken within the limits of a free State, he could not compel him to return again to a slave State without his consent. Lucas was accordingly discharged from custody, and being of full age, was left to return to Virginia or remain, as he might elect. This decision greatly enlarges all the previous decisions in similar cases, and may be regarded as limiting the claim of the master strictly to the case of a fugitive. [Tribune.

ROT IN FRUIT.

All those who are in the habit of putting up fruit for use or for sale, are sensible that a large portion of it is lost by rot or decay. There are two causes of this; one the natural decay of the fruit, and the other a fungi or parasite, which, when once it fixes its roots in the fruit, spreads with destructive rapidity.

The result of the first is seen, when it is attempted to keep the fruit beyond the time fixed by nature for its decay. Thus apples that are ripe in August, will rarely keep sound till January; decay usually beginning at the center, and progressing until the whole is destroyed. So with plums, peaches, grapes, &c. The second kind of decay, or that which arises from fungus, usually commences at some point on the exterior part, and penetrates into the inside, as well as spreads over the surface. The bitter rot, so destructive in some cellars, and to some particular kinds of the apple, is an example of this parasitic destroyer.

Mr. Hassall of London has lately been engaged in a series of microscopical experiments on these fungi, determining their characters, and the manner in which they are propagated. He produced apples inoculated with the sporules of the fungi only three days previous, in which the rot had already extended to the size of half a crown; and the fruit was unfit for the table. It appears from the experiments of Mr. H. that the seed-like bodies of these fungi are too minute for the eye to detect, even in masses of considerable size, and they are always floating in the air around the place where such plants are able to fructify; wherever they meet with a portion of the skin of a fruit, a little torn or abraded, there they can establish themselves; and when the surface of a fruit is in no way injured, they are able, but with less rapidity, to introduce their microscopical spawn through the pores of the skin.

It is not improbable that the disagreeable odors so common in fruit cellars where decaying fruit is present, is in a great degree owing to these microscopic sporules that fill the air of such places; and the propriety of thorough ventilation would suggest itself as the means of checking the progress or spread of the fungi. It may seem incredible at first, that such minute substances should operate so quickly on living vegetable matter: but the instances mentioned by Liebig of the action of putrid animal matter applied to living tissue, would seem to place this rapid action of vegetable poison on fruit in a clear light. We observed not long since an account of a fruit grower in Herefordshire in England, who preserved his fruit in a perfect condition, even when piled in large masses, by dashing over them once a week a sufficient quantity of pure water to wet the whole thoroughly, the apples being so placed on hurdles in the cellar, that the water could drain off readily. It is evident such an application of water would displace any sporules or fungi, unless they had taken very firm root, and it is probable the water would have the effect of imparting a vigor to the fruit, that would enable it to resist for a longer time the attacks of this insidious and destructive enemy.

FATTENING HOGS.

Fatting hogs must now have as much as they can eat: they should be urged forward as fast as possible before cold weather comes. They will gain more in on week now, than in two weeks three months hence. There is much in the garden now that may be added to the mush for hogs. Pumpkins, refuse squashes, cabbages, apples, potatoes, &c., may be boiled up, or occasionally fed out raw, just for variety—for pig is a gentleman that prefers a variety of dishes, and a good dessert.

Give him, also, your greenest corn, cutting up cob, and corn, and stalk, an inch or two long. He will eat up all clean while they are novelties in his pen. After all, your main stay for fatting him up, is grain of some kind. Indian corn ground, is best. Buckwheat comes next; rye is good, mixed with Indian; and oats always make the breakfast relish well.

You should bear in mind to let your hogs have charcoal every year; therefore we name it that you need not suppose what was said and done about it last year, will answer for this. A little brimstone, too is good—and brimstone need alarm no one, since we keep it to whiten straw with.

APPLES FOR COWS.

A peck or more to a cow, of mellow, ripe apples, will increase her milk, and will not diminish her meat. Pumpkins, too, improve the milk and make good beef. [Ib.

VALUE OF A LIFE BOAT.—The brig Tremont, of New York, Capt. Leeds, went ashore at Point Alderton, Hull, on Monday morning, Oct. 7, having been driven in by exceedingly tempestuous weather, and almost dashed to peices. She grounded on the Bar, at low water; and the Captain and the crew, seven in number, expected nothing less than immediate destruction.

Mr. Moses B. Tower, of Hull, discovering their perilous situation, hastened to obtain assistance, and with the help of two men and of his own horses, succeeded in conveying the Life Boat from the house in which it is kept, to a suitable place for launching, being at the distance of a mile and a half. On his way he procured five other men, who, together with Mr. Tower and the first two, launched the boat—and, rowing to the distance of somewhat more than a mile, at length reached the wreck. They found the captain and the crew clinging to the quarter deck, where they had been for more than seven hours in extreme peril, and though greatly exhausted, they were all brought safely to shore. HEBREW BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.—The 23d anniversary of this Society was celebrated on Wednesday night at the Apollo. Hon. M. M. Noah presided, and after the removal of the cloth a most eloquent Oration was delivered by the Rev. Mr. Isaacs. A collection was made in aid of the funds of the charity. The President announced that last year the receipts were $3,025, and the disbursements $2,964, leaving a balance of only $61. The company responded to this announcement by subscribing upward of $2,000 in the room. After the necessary business had been disposed of, several gentlemen addressed the chair, including Prof. Wind, of N. J., Messrs. Sullivan and J. B. Phillips, of the N. York bar, and T. A. Myers, Esq. Secretary to the Society. [True Sun.

LEATHER GLOVES.—In the village of Gloversville, Johnstown, Montgomery Co., N. Y. the manufacturing of Gloves is carried on to a large extent. More than 200 men and boys and 1,500 women are employed, principally in their own houses. The amount of Gloves sold is from 300,000 to 400,000 a year. About $10,000 worth of Sewing-Silk is used in a year. This was formerly Italian Silk, but they now buy American Sewing-Silk, made in Connecticut. They purchase in the City of New York about $100,000 worth of dressed Deerskin annually.

A SHOCKING TRAGEDY.—From a Louisiana paper we learn that a heart-sickening tragedy was enacted recently in Noxubee County, Miss. It appears that a man named Gayton Jones had some difficulty with his brother-in-law, a Mr. Glenn, in regard to a family dispute, when he (Mr. J.) struck Glenn with a fence rail on his head, inflicting a wound supposed to be mortal, he was not expected to live at the last acoounts. Jones made some arrangements for a legal defence, and went to secure the services of his lawyers, both of whom were absent. He returned home, and on the next day took a loaded pistol, deliberately seated himself in a chair in his house, held the pistol to the side of his head, and fired, literally blowing off the top of his head. He threw himself back, turning over the chair, and fell dead upon the floor.

A young man named E. Dyee, aged about 20, residing at Chatham Four Corners, was killed while imprudently playing with a gun. He was endeavoring to frighten several ladies who were near him by pointing his musket at them; failing in this, he then heroically placed the gun against his stomach and his foot on the breach, and his foot slipping against the lock, the whole charge entered his bowels, causing instant death.

The Grand Jury, in Philadelphia, have found true bills against David C. Hoffman, charged with the murder of John Guyer, of the Germantown Blues, during the riots in Southwark; and against John S. The semi-monthly mail stemer Caledonia left Boston on the 16th for Halifax and Liverpool, with 60 passengers. Among the passengers were Judge White of Connecticut, the new American Consul for Liverpool; Mr. Macready and Ryder, of London, and Lorenzo Draper, Esq. late Consul to Paris, and daughter.

A most destructive fire occurred in London, C. W., on the 7th inst. which destroyed a great deal of valuable property. The whole of the best shops in the town are in ruins.

Dr. Anson Jones was elected President of Texas by a majority of from eight to eleven hundred votes over General Burleston.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location, thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y. The fall term will open on WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 14th, under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

LEAVES FROM A TRAVELER'S NOTE-BOOK—NO. 7.

LONDON.

Who shall attempt to describe London? It is a town containing some 200,000 houses and public edifices, nearly 2,000,000 of inhabitants, and covering twenty square miles. It measures seven miles long from east to west, and averages more than three miles broad from north to south. It is the center of commerce for the whole world, having its agencies stationed at every important place on the eastern or western hemisphere, and embracing in its population the representatives of almost every nation on the face of the earth. Plans formed in London may affect the destinies of half the human race; and eyes which gaze at the same moment upon the rising and the setting sun, are turned thitherward for counsel and direction. It is a sort of heart for the body politic of the whole world. If its pulsations be strong and healthy, it sends life and joy to the most distant corners of the earth. But if they be dull and stagnant, or unnaturally excited, the consequences are as widely felt. A wonderful place truly is London, whether it be thought of as a world in miniature, presenting fashion in its scenes of dissipation, and poverty in its scenes of debauchery; or be looked upon as the point of intercommunication between colonies stretched from the north pole to the south, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean.

The early history of London is enveloped in much mystery. It is difficult, therefore, to say exactly at what time it was founded, or by what means it has risen from being an insignificant town, to its present position as the metropolis of the world. Its geographical position is such as to have given it the full benefit of all the changes which have been produced by the improvements in navigation, and by the growing importance of the northern countries and the western world. It is situated in a low valley on the river Thames, about thirty miles from the sea. At an early period, it was enclosed within a wall about two miles in extent, embracing some four hundred acres. The wall is supposed to have been about twenty feet high, surmounted at intervals by turrets, and intersected by gates opening upon the high roads. There were originally only four gates, but others were afterwards added as they became necessary.

London was made a bishop's see soon after the conversion of the Saxons to the Christian faith. In 610 a cathedral was erected and dedicated to St. Paul, on the site at present occupied by the splendid St. Paul's Cathedral. In consideration of £1,500 paid by the citizens, Richard I. granted them a charter which gave them the jurisdiction of the river Thames. John, in whose reign the Magna Charta was signed, granted the city several charters, by means of which a mayor was chosen, and the importance of the city was greatly increased. In the reign of Henry VIII. many improvements were made by the suppression of the monasteries, which transferred several extensive and valuable buildings to places of active business and industry, besides setting free thousands of persons who had been unwilling captives to those institutions. The introduction of police regulations soon after, the removal of nuisances, and the paving of the streets, gave a new impulse to trade and enterprise.

But there was one obstacle to the growth of the city, which none of these changes removed. The houses had been constructed of wood, thatched with straw, and each story allowed to project forward as it rose, so that the upper stories often nearly or quite met at the top. Hence the streets were a sort of tunnels, through which a free circulation of air could not be secured, and the health of the city consequently suffered. Fortunately for succeeding ages, however, the Great Fire, as it is called, came to their relief. It broke out on the 2d of September, 1666, and continued to rage for four days, destroying nearly five-sixths of the whole city and suburbs. This event is kept in memory by a monument on Fish street, on which is inscribed a full account of the fire, placing the damage at nearly $50,000,000. Within four years afterwards, the city was again rebuilt, in a style greatly superior to what it had formerly been.

London has several times been brought to the verge of destruction. In the latter end of the eighth century, it was visited by four large fires, in which many of its inhabitants perished, and much property was destroyed. About the middle of the tenth century, a dreadful pestilence swept off its population by thousands; and a few years later, another heavy fire, together with the vicissitudes of war, were equally disastrous. But the worst of all its visitations was from the Plague, which occurred in the reign of Charles II., and which was so dreadful as to make the contemplation of it painful. This plague commenced in 1665, and continued to rage for thirteen months, during some parts of which time, the deaths amounted to eight thousand a week. It spared no age or condition; the gay and the grave, the rich and the poor, the proud and the humble, were alike exposed, and were swallowed up in the common ruin. Whole families were swept away; whole districts were depopulated; all business was suspended; and the death-like silence of the streets was at times only broken by the chilling command, "Bring out your dead!" Probably one hundred thousand persons perished by this single visitation.

But in spite of all its adversities, London has continued to extend its limits, and to increase in commercial importance. The religious persecutions in France, and indeed all over the continent, drove thousands from their own country to England, where they became most useful and enterprising citizens. London was the common resort, and it received about 15,000 French Protestants within a short period. From this time, houses and public edifices rose in quick succession upon a large extent of unoccupied ground, in every direction from the old city walls. Several towns which were formerly separated from the city proper by considerable intermediate spaces, are now included in the metropolis, which covers, as before stated, some twenty square miles.

In order to obtain a just impression of the extent and business of London, a stranger should traverse some of the continued lines of streets which run from east to west, nearly parallel with the Thames. At any time from ten o'clock in the forenoon, until five o'clock in the afternoon, he will find them thronged with a mixed multitude, of whose endless occupations and numberless objects, his curiosity can hardly conceive. Or, let him stand upon the deck of one of the numerous little steamboats which ply upon the river, running from east to west, and stopping every half a mile to land and receive passengers; and as he marks the numerous vessels and barges, or the countless high chimneys of the manufactories, or the church spires almost concealed by the smoke and distance, or listens to the rumbling sound which rises from the collected industry of a million of active mortals—and he may perhaps obtain some impression of the extent of this great metropolis.

One whose investigations qualify him to speak of the extent and resources of London, has given the following account of it, with which this notice shall close:

"It is a perfect German principality—a Cobourg, if you please, or a Hesse Homburg in brick. You have spent five millions sterling on your bridges alone. You have docks to hold all the ships in the world. The London Docks alone cover 100 acres of ground, and the vaults hold 65,000 pipes of wine. The West India Docks cover 290 acres, and can hold 500 large merchantmen with ease. The Commercial Dock covers 49 acres, and is, I believe, exclusively confined to the Baltic trade. There are 2950 ships of the port of London alone, of 581,000 tons total burden, and manned by 32,000 seamen. The vessels engaged in the Colonial, Irish, and coasting trades, including the colliers, and also 360 British vessels, were 2335. The tonnage of the foreign vessels which entered this port in 1840 from Russia, Sweden, Germany, France, the Mediterranean, China, and the United States, amounted to 4,167,174 tons. Upon an average of the last ten years, London alone has paid £11,000,000 in custom duties, out of the £23,500,000 which the whole revenue of that department amounts to. There are 2000 merchants and brokers within half a mile of the Exchange. You have 100,000 houses of business, probably half of which have shops attached to them. All the details connected with London are upon the same gigantic scale. The water companies supply 237,000,000 hogsheads every year, and the gas companies furnish 10,000,000 cubit feet of gas every twenty-four hours. In Smithfield Market there were 180,780 head of cattle, and 1,500,000 of sheep, in round numbers, sold in the year 1839. Your very paving and sewer rates amount to £630,000 a year. The London newspapers consume 10,000,000 of stamps annually. The steamboats carry 10,000 passengers every day. There are 1000 miles of railway stretching from London into every part of the kingdom, and bringing its population into contact with all the great cities of the country, completed at an expense of nearly £5,000,000 sterling. There are 59 canals, which cost £45.000,000. The monthly business conducted by the London bankers alone averages £75,000,000, and has amounted to £87,000,000 in one month."

STATED PRAYER.

"There is no religion without prayer. Have stated times for devotion. At the least, begin and end every day with God. Take time from sleep, rather than want time for prayer. Watch against formality in your devotions. It is heartfelt prayers that are alone acceptable to God. Besides your intercourse with God at stated seasons, often be looking up to him; and ever go to him in the name of Jesus. Go into your closet, or down upon your knees for prayer, with as much reverence as if you beheld the great and blessed God. You require to be often reminded of this. For whether in childhood, in youth, in manhood, or in old age, we are all too apt to have a wandering heart in prayer, and repeat an outward form with the lips; but with a heart, alas, far from God. Oh, pray against this heartlessness, as one of the most powerful temptations of your spiritual enemy. Could you ascend into heaven every morning and evening, to offer your devotions to the Most High, and then return again to earth, what a life of holiness would you lead! What fervent prayers and thanksgiving would you offer! Consider that 'the eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good,' and that 'all things are naked and open before him with whom we have to do.'"

"Thrice happy souls, who, born from heaven,
Though yet they sojourn here,
Humbly begin their days with God,
And spend them in his fear.

"So may mine eyes, with holy zeal,
Prevent the dawning day,
May I devoutly read thy word,
And praise thy name, and pray."

MINISTERIAL EDUCATION—DUTY OF THE CHURCH.

We are gratified to notice, that religious associations of every name are taking into consideration and discussing their duty to the ministry. There is an influence exerted by the ministry over the people, and again by the people over the ministry, which makes it exceedingly important that the duties of each should be distinctly understood. If a minister becomes careless in the preparation and delivery of his sermons, or negligent about pastoral visits and other pastoral labors, the people soon notice it, and act accordingly. If, on the other hand, the people do not favor thorough preparation for the pulpit, and a faithful discharge of pastoral duties, by their approval and support, the minister is sure to notice and be influenced by it. It is only when the relative duties of each are understood and attended to, that the highest good is secured. Generally speaking, faithfulness on one side will be met by faithfulness on the other—a faithful pastor producing often a faithful people. In instances where this is not the case, we apprehend that there will generally be found good reason for changing the relation. This should not be done, however, without a thorough trial.

The following extracts from the Circular Letter of the New Jersey Baptist Association give a true account of the duty of the church to her young men preparing for the ministry, and a true picture of the consequences of neglecting to discharge that duty:— [Ed Rec.

A parent who neglects the education of his son on account of the expenses which might thereby be incurred, would be thought to have more love for his money than affection for his son. The church, blessed with such as have ministerial gifts, neglecting to furnish or use the means which she possesses, in preparing them for the responsible work of the Christian ministry, must be considered either insensible to the honor bestowed by Christ himself, or so enclosed in the invulnerable shell of covetousness, as to believe that all her duty can be performed by giving to such young men a written license to preach. Think of a young man receiving license from a church, and being sent out among the churches, merely for the sake of getting rid of him. What reproachful conduct! What trifling with the churches—how dishonorable to God and his cause—how injurious to the young man himself!

See him, in obedience to the church, going forth to preach without any mental culture, unused to study, unacquainted with language, ignorant of the Scriptures, inexperienced, insensible of the solemn responsibilities of his high vocation, having but little else to guide him than simply a desire to do good. He soon finds by painful experience that something more than a desire to be useful is necessary to qualify him to become an acceptable and useful preacher.

The struggle is commenced, he feels his own case to be a desperate one; not to preach would be impeaching the wisdom of the church that sent him out; to continue, keeps up a continual struggle between hope and fear, from year to year, and finally, worn down by labor, and disheartened by neglect, to die, unpitied and unblessed by the church that should never have sent him into the ministry, without first giving him all the means possible of becoming qualified to discharge the self-denying and arduous duties of his station.

DENOMINATIONAL LITERATURE.

We copy the following from the Circular Letter of a Baptist Association in Massachusetts. Its thoughts are weighty and true. It is an encouraging sign of the times, that nearly every denomination is now awake to the importance of thorough ministerial education, and well-conducted denominational publications. Read candidly, and apply faithfully.

"Knowledge is power." And thread-bare as the sentiment is, still it is no less applicable to our present purpose. Conceit, prejudice, contracted and selfish views of the catholic spirit of the gospel, grow prolific in that heart, which refuses to cultivate the fruits of knowledge; and it remains in the gross darkness of its own crude and stubborn imaginations, because it persists in rejecting all aid from nobler minds. No religious denomination can appropriately fulfil the duties which it owes to God and man, without a continual advancement in intellectual improvement. It can neither manfully maintain the principles from which it originated, nor contend successfully with those who are aiming to subvert them.

Thirty years since, we began, as a denomination, to awake from our long slumber, and slowly, as if we were afraid of the light, to open our eyes upon our condition. Ashamed any longer to sit in our own darkness, made cheerful only at intervals, by borrowed light from others, we made efforts to construct our own lamps and supply them with our own oil. For a proper understanding of the sacred word, unwilling any longer to sit as submissive disciples at the feet of other sects, we have presumed to interpret for ourselves. Grateful God for the improvement which he has enabled us to make, and which, for a few years past, will well compare with the most enterprising of other denominations, we are yet far behind that point of religious enterprise and intellectual attainment, at which it should be our aim to arrive. There are some facts connected with our present position, which, when we are disposed to ring the changes upon the great number of our communicants, should reprove us for our lack of denominational enterprise.

The Baptist denomination of the whole United States, can boast of only one quarterly periodical possessing a literary character; and had it not been for the generous contributions of a few enterprising individuals, even this would long since have been numbered "among the things lost on earth."

Among the one thousand clergymen, and the ten times that number of intelligent laymen of our denomination, to whom this work is so reasonably accessible, it has to beg eight hundred subscribers. It is a fact, which sadly tells of the want of denominational sympathy among us, that not a few who possess both the means and ability to make this periodical among the first in the land, fail to contribute either for its support. We would by no means recommend confining our patronage of literary periodicals within our own denomination, yet in the present state of our literature, it becomes us to have more forces at home and less abroad.

BURNET'S DESCRIPTION OF LEIGHTON.

Leighton was a bishop that had the greatest elevation of soul, the largest compass of knowledge, the most mortified and most heavenly disposition, that I ever yet saw in mortal; that had the greatest parts, as well as virtues, with the most perfect humility, that I ever saw in man; that had so sublime a strain, in preaching, with so grave a gesture, and such a majesty of thought, of language, and of pronunciation, that I never once saw a wandering eye where he preached, and have seen whole assemblies often melt in tears before him; and of whom I can say, with great truth, that in a free and frequent conversation with him for above two and twenty years, I never knew him to say an idle word, or one that had not a direct tendency to edification: and I never once saw him in any other temper, but that which I wished to be in the last minutes of my life.

From the "Voice of Jacob."

"DAYS OF OLD"—MOUNT HOREB.

"He will never return!" were the desponding words of Merab, as, following the direction of his son's earnest gaze, he looked towards Mount Horeb. "Say not so, dear father: the mercies of the Eternal our God are inexhaustible, and after afflicting us for our rebellious sin, not as an enemy who would destroy, but as a father who would correct, be sure that He will not forsake us."

"But, my son, forty days save one have elapsed since he left us, and we see no token of his return."

"Father, if the Lord had taken Moses away from us, to restore him no more, and without delivering into other hands the great charge committed to him, would that cloud still rest upon the tabernacle, so divinely fashioned, so resplendent in beauty, so awful in holiness; the place of meeting between the Lord of heaven and His poor children of earth? No, we are not forsaken; lean on me, dearest father, and let us go forth out of the camp, that our eyes may be brightened by gazing thereon."

They went; and Jabin lifted up his eyes and beheld the goodly array of Israel's host. It was a magnificent spectacle! but a sadness reigned throughout the camp. The tabernacle was no longer in the midst of them; Moses had received command to pitch it far beyond the lines that had before encircled it, as a token of the Lord's displeasure. When they passed the boundary a tremor seized the knees of Merab, and he leant more heavily upon his son, whose changing color betrayed the emotions of his soul also. "Never, never will it be effaced from my memory," said the old man in a low tone, as if he shrank from hearing his own reference to the event. "Thou, my beloved one, didst by thy passionate entreaties dissuade thy parents from joining bodily in the sin; but alas! our hearts were too much with the maddened crowd, who yielded reverence to the work of their own hands. Whilst thou wert weeping, rending thy garments, and defiling those silken locks with dust—or hiding with thy vesture, the eyes of the little ones, who laughed and would have danced responsive to the unhallowed song—we abhorred not the deed; we deemed it idle, and a disgraceful imitation of our vanquished; but not jealous like thee, were we of the glory of the Holy One.

Oh that cry, that shriek of three thousand dying sinners! the terrible look of our meek Leader when around him lay the fragments of the mysterious stone, that God's own finger had engraven; and the sons of Levi, in the deep silence of stern resolve, pursued the work of slaughter through the camp. Jabin, I still feel the frantic grasp of our unhappy kinsman, who had scoffed at our abstinence from the feast even more than at our confidence as to the manna—his cries as they dragged him from me—the gush of his warm life-blood"—he paused, for Jabin grew so deadly pale that the father's heart reproached him with the needless pang. "Let us worship the Lord, my child; and pray Him to restore our Moses, for Israel without him is but as a headless trunk." "Not so, my father; the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, the God of Jacob, is Israel's Head. As such, let us bow before Him, and confess that, in the midst of judgments, His mercy endureth forever."

They worshiped in the Tabernacle of the congregation; and with cheering words beguiled the evening hour, recounting how the Lord had visited, and with a mighty hand, and stretched out arm, had delivered them from Egypt. His heart was anxious, not that he doubted the return of Moses, but he trembled lest Israel, impatient at his long delay, might commit some act displeasing to the Lord. When on the fortieth morning he went forth to gather his supply of manna, and filled his pitcher at the sparkling stream, ever swelling from the smitten rock, he blessed the Eternal for the daily tokens of His abiding mercy, and went back rejoicing to the tent.

Suddenly a movement was observed throughout the immense camp; every eye was turned, every step was bent towards Mount Horeb. A light, not that of flaming fire, but softly brilliant as the glow-worm's brightness, sparkling from the dewy grass; such a light, vivid even in the sunshine, was seen on the hill's descent; and as it came nearer, they might all descry the mildly majestic form of Moses, from whose countenance shone out the lingering reflection of a glory, that no mortal eye save his had looked upon. There was a subdued shout of glad welcome, as the Leader drew nigh; lengthened out into articulate tones of thankfulness, as they beheld within his arms the two tables, with which it had pleased the Most Merciful to replace the forfeiture of their sin. But the brilliancy of which Moses himself was not conscious, proved too dazzling for men's eyes; and, ere he could deliver the gracious message, he was obliged to veil his face. O Majesty Eternal and unspeakable, the very sight of which imprints a trace of its own beauty! Well did Moses know of what he spake, when in the sublimely touching Psalm that bears his name he prayed, "The glorious majesty of the Lord our God be upon us!"

INTERESTING PROVIDENCES.

The Rev. James Haldane, pastor of one of the Baptist churches in Edinburgh, Scotland, was a junior member of a highly respectable and wealthy family. In his youth he became connected with the British army, and rose to the post of captain in one of his majesty's war ships. On one occasion, being engaged in a warmly contested battle, he saw the whole of his men on deck swept off by a tremendous broadside from the enemy. He ordered another company to be "piped up" from below to take the place of their lost companions. On coming up they saw their mangled remains strewed upon the deck, and were seized with a sudden and irresistible panic. On seeing this, the captain jumped up and swore a horrid oath, imprecating the vengeance of Almighty God upon the whole of them, and wishing that they might all go to hell. An old marine who was a pious man, stepped up to him, and respectfully touching his hat, said, "Captain, I believe God hears prayer; and if God had heard your prayer just now, what would have become of us?" Having spoken this, he made a respectful bow and returned to his place. After the engagement, the captain calmly reflected upon the words of the old marine, and was so deeply affected by them, that he devoted his attention to the claims of religion, and was subsequently converted to God.

Of course, he informed his brother Robert of his change of views; but instead of being gratified by it, his brother was greatly offended, and requested him never to enter his house till he had changed his views. "Very well, Robert," said James, "but I have one comfort in the case, and that is, you cannot prevent my praying for you;" and holding out his hand, he bade him good-bye. His brother Robert was much affected by this; he could not get rid of the idea that his brother was constantly praying for him. He saw the error of his ways, and after much investigation and reflection, became a decided Christian.

Some years afterwards, Robert Haldane made a journey to the Continent, and settled for some time in Geneva. He was much affected with the low spiritual condition of the Protestant Church there, which had become infected with the rationalistic and neological views prevalent in Germany. Indeed the clergy themselves had so far departed from the faith of the Reformation as to reject almost all the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel. Mr. Haldane made himself acquainted with the students attending the divinity school in Geneva, and invited a number of them to his house, and, by free conversation, endeavored to teach the Gospel and the nature of spiritual religion. This he frequently repeated, till at last God blessed his efforts to the conversion of ten or twelve of them. Among them were Felix Neff, subsequently pastor in the high Alps, and one of the purest and most devoted men that ever lived; Henry Pyt, another well known and truly pious man; and Henry Merle D'Aubigne, well known throughout the literary and religious world as the author of the History of the Reformation, and the president of the new Evangelical School of Theology in Geneva.

A Missing Battalion.—Killed off! was an expression once unhapily made use of in the British Senate, by some cold-blooded metaphysicians: but to show how easily military men are reconciled to the thing itself, Mr. Labaume has given us an anecdote of the campaign against Russia, by Napoleon. It appears that toward the extreme right the Russians had a redoubt, which, by its destructive fire, spread consternation through the French line. After a sanguinary combat of about an hour, this redoubt was carried, with the loss of twelve hundred men, who remained dead in the entrenchment; and next day, when Napoleon was reviewing the sixty-first regiment, which had suffered the greatest loss, he asked the colonel what had become of one of his battalions; "Sire," replied he, "it is in the redoubt!"

What it Costs.—In the year 1834, the money expended for intoxicating drink in the city of Glasgow, was nearly equal to the whole amount expended for charity and benevolence in the United Kingdom; the loss of productive labor in every department of occupation was equal to one day in six; the annual loss of Great Britain alone, directly and indirectly, from the

DESPONDENCY AND HOPE.

The faithful minister of the Gospel will often have occasion both to mourn and to rejoice. His labors are directed to the conversion and salvation of men. And when he sees, as he sometimes will see, that but little apparent good results from his labors; that the number is small of those who turn away from their sins; and that even the professedly pious make comparatively little progress in religion—he will often be pressed down with anxiety, and compelled to write hard things against himself. In his anxiety to see the greatest good accomplished, he overlooks the work which has actually been done in preparing the ground and scattering the precious seed. Hence he questions his own faithfulness, trembles at the condition of the thoughtless, and is almost ready to give up the strife. But after long and anxious watching, he perhaps sees the dawning of a brighter day; the clouds, which had seemed impenetrable, begin to break and pass away; the powerful workings of the Spirit of God are manifest among the people; there is a depth and tenderness of feeling of which he had not conceived; the truth takes effect in the hearts which had been prepared to receive it; and the result is, the conversion and salvation of men. In such circumstances, how does his heart rejoice! His fondest hopes have been realized; his earnest and oft-presented prayers have been answered; and God is glorified in the redemption of souls. In the hour of despondency, then, the faithful minister should support himself by the hope of the Psalmist: "He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him."

ROMANISM IN ENGLAND.

From statements recently made by an eminent popish teacher, Dr. Wiseman, it appears that within the last six years there have been built fifty-four new Catholic churches in England, in large towns, and on a scale of great magnificence. A church just opened at Nottingham, is the largest which has been built in England since the Reformation. One is now progressing in London, which will be second only to St. Paul's. As further proof of the progress of Romanism, it is stated, that during the same period, nineteen communities of nuns have been established, and nine religious houses for men; the press at Derbe has issued nearly two millions of Catholic publications, which are sold at a profit, to supply the extensive demand; and nine clergymen of the church of England, to say nothing of numbers who were studying for orders in that church, have joined the Catholic communion.

At the first glance this may be regarded by some as a dark sign of the times. We cannot regard it as exclusively so. The elements of popery have long been working in the church from which these accessions were received; and it is well that they should be brought to light. Happy were it if the evil extended no farther. We fear, however, that the "mark of the Beast" will be found upon thousands of those who cry most loudly against her. Quite sure we are, that the spirit of popery is breathed by some of the leading ecclesiastical organizations and religious journals of our own country—organizations and journals, the leading conductors of which profess to be greatly frightened at a papal edict acknowledging and requiring what they practically teach. The sooner these things come to the light the better.

CONDITION OF THE JEWS.

The severe oppression which the Jews have experienced from the Russian Government, and which has been carried out, through the influence of that government, in some of the German principalities, seems likely to lead to important results. Many who have the means, and who believe the period at hand when they are to return to Zion, are wending their way toward Jerusalem. It is said that the arrivals at the Holy City have been so numerous of late, as to make it difficult to obtain accommodations; and extensive arrangements are therefore making for the accommodation of visitors. The Jewish population of Jerusalem is estimated to have increased from 5,000 to 40,000; besides which there are large numbers residing in the surrounding cities and villages. The persecutions of Russia have induced the Turkish Sultan to extend protection to the Jews; and he has, by this stroke of policy, drawn around him many of the powerful bankers of that nation. At Constantinople alone there are more than 100,000 Jews, to whom many new facilities are now extended. Abraham Pacha, the new Viceroy of Egypt, is also their friend and helper. Through these means, great results may be expected toward the fulfillment of the prophecies.

But perhaps a more important sign of the times respecting the Jews, is found in the extensive demand for reform among them. Great divisions have taken place in several European congregations upon this subject. In some cases the laws and superstitious customs of the Rabbinists and Talmudists, have been entirely renounced; in others, partially so. Both in Europe, Asia, and America, the call is loud for such reforms as the spirit and improvement of the present age demands. A sanhedrim of the learned men of the nation, to be held at Jerusalem, has been proposed, to discuss all the reforms in religion which do not affect the cardinal principles of their faith. Such a meeting would do much to improve the worship among them.

In literature and the arts the Jews are making considerable progress. They have many hard students, whose investigations in science have been of a bold and important character, such as will add to their influence among Christian powers. The periodical press of the Jews is receiving accessions, among which we find a paper at Gibralter, one in Jamaica, one in Australia, and upwards of twenty in different parts of the world, devoted to the literature and religion of the Jews. Their progress in the arts is shown by the fact, that in France they have introduced many successful inventions for which they have received medals; including all the leading branches of mechanical industry. In this country they may be found engaging in nearly every avocation which is pursued by Gentiles.

A recent report of one of the benevolent societies of the Jews in this country, states, that in consequence of the partial troubles which have broken out in Germany, many of those who are comparatively happy are anxious to emigrate, and that great accessions may be expected during the coming year by emigration. The report farther states, that the Jews have discovered, that this is the land "shadowing with wings, which lies beyond the rivers of Ethiopia," as referred to by the prophet Isaiah; and they are anxious to come under the protection of those wings which shelter equally the Jew and the Gentile.

These facts are sufficient to show, that changes are rapidly taking place among that wonderful people. Those who have observed how closely their former history has been connected with the fulfillment of prophecy, will look for a connection here. Let such rejoice in the changes, and pray that the time of restoration may speedily come.

DOGMATISM—"THE CHRISTIAN INDEX."

The dogmatism of ignorance and error is proverbial; and when it expends itself upon unimportant subjects, it may sometimes be permitted to do so without rebuke. But when, under the cover of zeal for God and religion, men utter dogmas hostile to the truth, and subversive of it, they may not safely be overlooked. We feel called upon, therefore, to say a few words in reply to an article in the last number of the Christian Index, which, under the head of "Sabbath Occupations," repeats with uncommon positiveness, the threadbare dogmas about the change of the Sabbath. The writer of that article allows that the Sabbath was instituted in Paradise, and was designed to be perpetuated in the Christian church, and then remarks:

> "But it may be asked, 'Upon what authority has the day been changed?' In reply to this, we answer, Upon the same authority by which it was first instituted. The Saviour of the world declared himself to be 'the Lord of the Sabbath,' having the same authority to change it as to institute it. The lawfulness of observing the first day of the week for the true Sabbath, may be proved from the sanction of Jesus Christ. On the first day of the week, (the Christian Sabbath,) he arose, having finished the work of redemption, and triumphed over death and hell. On the first day of the week he met two of his disciples going to Emmaus, and opened their hearts to understand the Scriptures; on the evening of the same day he met the eleven, when Thomas was absent, and gave them his blessing. John 20: 19. Again, eight days after, being the next first day of the week, when the disciples were assembled, and Thomas with them, Jesus chose this day again to meet with them. ver. 36. Although Christ met frequently with his disciples, no day is mentioned but the first day of the week, and this is always in connection with the assemblies of the disciples for religious purposes."

In this extract are two assertions which cannot be proved:

I. That the day was changed upon the same authority by which it was first instituted. The only show of proof which the writer gives, is, that the Saviour is "Lord of the Sabbath." But what has this to do with the question? The passage might as well be used to prove that he abolished the Sabbath altogether; and it might much better be used to prove that he would protect and continue it as it was. Instead of using his authority as "Lord of the Sabbath," to change the day on which it was observed, our Saviour uniformly kept that day. And when the Jews charged him with not being sufficiently strict, he vindicated himself by exposing their superstitions, and not by referring to any change which should thereafter take place. Indeed, lest some should think that he came to change or modify the original law, he says distinctly, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil." "Whosoever shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven." It is surprising to us, that after reading these words of the Saviour, any man will dare to convey the impression that he changed the Sabbath, without being able to give the passage in which it is recorded.

II. "The lawfulness of observing the first day of the week for the true Sabbath," is said to be proved "from the sanction of Jesus Christ." Here it is important to notice, that to prove the lawfulness of observing the first day, does not necessarily prove the Sabbath to have been changed. But granting, for the sake of argument, that it does, let us look at the proof brought:

1. "On the first day of the week he arose, having finished the work of redemption, and triumphed over death and hell." If this were all true it would make nothing for the first day, since the Scriptures do not intimate that the day should be afterwards celebrated. But there are some who doubt whether Christ rose from the dead on the first day of the week. He said that he would be "three days and three nights" in the grave; and since he was buried in the afternoon, and was risen and gone when the disciples came to the sepulchre "in the end of the Sabbath," they suppose that he rose in the afternoon of the Sabbath, which supposition can be reconciled with all the facts in the case.—There are others who doubt whether the work of redemption was finished by the resurrection; they think it much more likely that it was completed when Christ said on the cross, "It is finished," and gave up the ghost.

2. "On the first day of the week he met two of his disciples going to Emmaus," &c. Very true; they went to Emmaus, and returned again to Jerusalem, making a journey of about fifteen miles. This would be regarded at the present day as rather poor Sabbath-keeping. Yet they were not rebuked for it by the Saviour.

3. "On the evening of the same day he met the eleven." Not a word is said at that meeting, however, about a change of the Sabbath; the disciples did not expect the Saviour; but were together, as is generally supposed, for a common meal, and had shut the doors for fear of the Jews. Besides, according to their reckoning, this was not on the first day, but the beginning of the second day.

4. "Although Christ met frequently with his disciples, no day is mentioned but the first day of the week, and this is always in connection with the assemblies of the disciples for religious purposes." But our Bible speaks of meetings on other days and for other purposes. Christ appeared to the disciples when they were fishing at the sea of Tiberias, John 21: 13; and was seen of them forty days before his ascension, Acts 1: 3. Now, if the appearance of Christ on the first day proves it to be the Sabbath, then his appearances on other days prove them to be Sabbaths, since as important business was transacted, and as much mention made of the Sabbath, in one case as in the others. And if this be allowed, then we have the example of Christ and the Apostles for traveling, fishing, or doing any other business on the Sabbath. To such results would consistency drive the writer in the Index, if he would carry out his principle, that example, without precept, may regulate practice.

Without entering into a further review of this article—and without stopping to deny an assertion, (which every historian knows to be untrue,) that ecclesiastical history shows the first day to have been observed as the Sabbath since the days of the Apostles,—we will close by expressing a hope, that before the writer allows himself again to speak so dogmatically upon a religious subject, he will be sure that his own dogmas do not conflict with the Scriptures and ecclesiastical history.

ACCIDENTS AND JUDGMENTS.

For the Recorder.

Much has been said and written of late on the punishment of transgressors; some are for having it all in this world, and others all in the next. Among other conspicuous characters who have taken sides on this question, is Dr. Edwards, agent of the "Sabbath Union," who has on several occasions declared his belief that the many "accidents" which happen on the first day of the week are directed by the special providence of God as a punishment for Sabbath-breaking. Now, supposing the first day of the week to be the Sabbath of the Lord, (which it is certain they cannot prove,) I think it derogatory to the character of Almighty God to bring such a charge against him. If that is the way or method which he has selected to punish mankind for their sins in one form, why not follow up the whole catalogue of crimes in the same way? Why is the violator of the Sabbath selected as a subject for divine justice or vengeance, while the midnight assassin, the robber, the adulterer, the false swearer, pass on unarrested, with no "accidents" awaiting them, though guilty of crimes of a much deeper dye? Where is it recorded, that the murderer, with his deadly weapon in his hand, forcing his way into his neighbor's house to execute his fiendish purpose, has met with an "accident" from the hand of Jehovah, to frustrate his design, and send him instantly into eternity, unprepared to meet his Judge? Or, has the uplifted hand of the false swearer, while taking a false oath against his neighbor, been palsied or stricken down by Divine Justice? I have not seen such a record; neither do I believe that such a scheme or plan is in the regular order of divine Providence, nor that it will appear probable to any but the most thoughtless of mankind.

One of old was perplexed with the prosperity of the wicked, wondering, no doubt, with Dr. Edwards, why Divine Justice did not smite them for their transgressions, but was relieved by this consideration: "Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world; they increase in riches. When I thought to know this, it was too painful for me, until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end." "Such," observes Rev. J. Dick, "is the intermixture of mankind by a variety of relations, that the separate treatment of each individual according to his desert, is at present next to impossible. If the head of a family is stricken down, the innocent members suffer from the stroke. If the wife or a child is taken, he feels the blow. This is assigned by our Lord as the reason why bad men are permitted to mingle with the good, and hold their place in society, contrary to what it might seem to us that perfect justice demands. 'Wilt thou,' said the servants to their master, when they discovered tares among the wheat, 'that we go and gather them? But he said, Nay, lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. Let both grow together until the harvest.'"

In further illustration of the subject, our Lord puts the question to his disciples, "Suppose ye that those Galileans whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices, were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? Or those eighteen on whom the tower of Siloam fell and slew them, think ye that they were sinners above all men who dwelt in Jerusalem?" And then he gives an answer to the question distinctly in the negative.

Whether it makes for us or against us, says Dr. Henry, we must abide by this rule, that we cannot judge of men's sins by their suffering in this world; for if so, we might as justly consider that the oppressors, and Pilate among the rest, on whose side is power and success, are the greatest saints, as that the oppressed, and those Galileans among the rest, who are all in tears, are the greatest sinners. If we will be judging, we have enough to do to judge ourselves; "nor indeed can we know love or hatred by all that is before us, because all things come alike to all." Eccles. 9: 1, 2.

LABAN.

THE PROPHECIES OF DANIEL.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S DREAM OF THE GREAT IMAGE. (No. 2.) By GEORGE BUSH, Professor of Hebrew, New York City University.

We noticed some weeks since the appearance of the first number of this work, by Prof. BUSH. In that notice we spoke in terms of unqualified approbation of the spirit and ability with which the investigation was conducted. The second and last number is now before us, and sustains the expectations awakened by the first. The whole work embodies the results of much research and original thought, peculiarly adapted to the present time. It strikes at the root of those expectations of a sudden catastrophe to the earth, which have rested mainly upon the interpretations of this vision. If the writer has modified the feelings of some wonder-loving minds, by setting forth the gradual fulfillment of the predictions, yet we believe he has not diminished the incentives to hope in the work of reforming mankind. We regard the book as a valuable addition to Prof. Bush's former contributions to the cause of sacred literature.

Without entering into the reasoning and exposition by which the writer conducts us to his conclusions, we shall content ourselves with giving the following summary, with which the work closes:—

> "In conclusion, let us follow the example of Daniel on another occasion, and 'write the sum of the matter' in a general recapitulation of the main results.
>
> 1. The vision of the Great Image accorded to Nebuchadnezzar was a divinely inspired vision, extending down in its prophetical reach to distant posterity, even to 'the time of the end,' or the grand consummation announced under the seventh trumpet of the Apocalypse, when the kingdoms of this world are to become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ.
>
> 2. The four kingdoms represented by the four metals, are the four great empires which occupy so prominent a place in the history of the world's by-gone ages, viz., the Babylonian, the Medo-Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman.
>
> 3. The grand moral drift of the vision is to exhibit an imposing and striking emblem of the long line of despotical governments which have lorded it so disastrously over the human race, from the most ancient periods of its history.
>
> 4. The Stone cut out of the mountain without hands, is the mystical designation of Christianity, or the 'kingdom of heaven,' deriving its origin from the Jewish nation, and which is destined to supplant and do away all systems of mere secular sovereignty, which are opposed to its essential spirit and aim.
>
> 5. The action of the smiting stone upon the image, denotes a gradual and not a sudden overthrow of the empires thus prophetically doomed to destruction. The process of demolition commenced at the ushering in of Christianity during the reign of the earlier Roman emperors—was continued down through the subsequent epochs of that power in its divided and dismembered state—and is still going on among the prominent nations of modern Europe, which in their origin and continuance form the ten toes of the visionary image.
> 6. From distinct chronological data elsewhere afforded and to be hereafter considered, as well as from the obvious indications of Providence, the conclusion is irresistible, that we have reached at this day the borders of that grand transition period, which is to be distinguished by the passing away of the ancient dynasties of the earth, and the introduction and establishment of a new and happier economy, which is to be at once universal in extent and unlimited in duration;—an order of things, however, which is to be ushered in according to the ordinary analogy of divine Providence, and not by miraculous interpositions. 'Even so, come, Lord Jesus; come quickly.'"

THE BIBLE SABBATH—In a Review of D. F. Hutchinson's Letters, entitled "The Sabbatarian's False Weights and Measures Detected." By JAMES R. IRISH.

This is a pamphlet of seventy-six pages, vindicating the claims of the seventh day as the Bible Sabbath. It seems to have been drawn forth by another pamphlet, in which Mr. Irish deemed that he and the truth had been misrepresented. After disposing of the objectionable personal statements in the pamphlet, Mr. Irish has presented a refutation of the errors of his opponent, together with his own reasons for observing the seventh day. The work must have been acceptable to those who were acquainted with the controversy.

SLAVE TRAFFIC.

At a recent meeting of a Baptist Association in Virginia, one of the churches sent in the following query, which is published in connection with the answer. Together they show an improved feeling upon the subject of slave trading. But in reading the answer, one can hardly fail to inquire, If the traffic be wrong "for speculation," can it be right for any other purpose? Here is the question and answer:—

> Question. Is it consistent with the Christian religion, for a member of the Baptist church, to buy and sell negroes for speculation? If this query should be answered in the negative, then what course would the Association advise a church to pursue towards a member who persists in trafficking in slaves for speculation?
>
> Answer. We think that the traffic referred to in the query, is inconsistent with a profession of the religion of Jesus Christ. That a member of the church engaged in such a speculation, ought to be admonished of the evil, and persisting in the practice, ought to be excluded from fellowship.

GRAND LI NE MISSION.

This mission was commenced a few years ago, by a pious lady from Switzerland, among the French Roman Catholics in Canada. By means of a school, and by the distribution of Bibles and other religious books, an interest was awakened among the poor and ignorant, their prejudices were removed, and a spirit of inquiry was awakened. These labors have been continued, though in the midst of embarrassments and opposition, until the mission numbers some two hundred converts from the papal church and downright infidelity.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.—The Chittenden Co. Association, held a meeting lately at Montpelier, Vermont, at which the whole time was spent in considering the claims of the various benevolent societies, and in devising means to help them in their work. After a most interesting meeting, a plan was adopted to secure reports on the various objects for a future occasion, by the appointment of persons to prepare those reports. Who believes that the churches in that association will suffer for want of the attention which was bestowed upon these objects? We do not.

AN IMPORTANT FACT.—It is stated that in Western Virginia and Delaware, Conventions have recently been held, in which opposition to slavery was fearlessly expressed. In the Delaware Convention it was resolved, that "slavery ought to be abolished in that State at the next meeting of its legislature." No philanthropist can fail to rejoice at these evidences that the principles upon which the anti-slavery movement is based, are taking root in the soil of slave states. Such a condition of things cannot long exist without producing effects. "If a house be divided against itself, that house cannot stand."

DUTY OF PARENTS.—The Harmony Baptist Association, at its last meeting, passed the following resolution, which is worthy of being read, digested, and reduced to practice. It avoids the extreme, on the one hand, of staying away from church in order to keep the children away, and on the other, of taking the children to church and then allowing them to conduct as they please:

> Resolved, That we consider it the duty of parents to take their children to the house of God; but especially to keep them while there from interrupting the services by whispering, going out, or in any way disturbing the quiet and order which becomes the house of God.

SELLING LIQUOR ON SUNDAY.—The example set by the authorities of New York seems to have had influence in other places. On Sunday before last, at Hartford, Ct., four rum sellers were brought up for trafficking in the article on Sunday. They were fined four dollars each and costs.

HERESY CURED—The English Evangelical Synod of Ohio, at its late meeting, passed the following: "Resolved, That the following shall be a standing resolution of this Ministerium—That no member of this Ministerium shall be allowed to administer baptism by immersion."

THE EPISCOPAL CONVENTION adjourned on the 22nd inst. Among its last doings was the appointment of Rev. Horatio Southgate as Missionary Bishop to the dominions of the Sultan of Turkey, and the appointment of Rev. Wm. T. Boone as Bishop of China.

CHEERING.—The Washington correspondent of the Christian Watchman gives the welcome news, that a green spot has appeared recently in the moral desert. At one of the Methodist churches in that city a revival has been for some weeks in progress, as the fruits of which more than one hundred have been added to the church. In the other evangelical churches there are indications of the presence of the Lord, although there are no special awakenings.

A NEW COLLEGE.—The Synod of Geneva, at a late meeting in Ithaca, N. Y., discussed the question of establishing a College in Western New-York. It was stated, that for a population of 700,000 in that part of the State, sending 200 students annually to the eastern Colleges, there was no College whose religious views corresponded with those of the Synod. The project is to be considered and reported upon by a committee.

RESTORATION OF THE JEWS.—A lecture on the Restoration of the Jews and the coming of the Millennum, was delivered in the Broadway Tabernacle, on Monday evening last, by Maj. M. M. NOAH. It presented a variety of interesting and valuable suggestions, some of which we shall give in our next.

DEATH OF A MISSIONARY.—In the intelligence from China, received by the way of London, we find mentioned the death of Mrs. Lucy H., wife of Rev. D. Ball, M. D., of the mission established by the American Board. She died at Hong Kong, on the morning of the 6th June, aged 36 years.

The vessels having on board the Roman Catholic Bishop, the nuns, and others, which sailed some time ago from Brest for the Sandwich Islands, had not arrived at the date of the last accounts. Rumors prevailed in the South Seas that she had foundered off Cape Horn.

A revolutionary soldier named John Rowe, 102 years of age, was recently baptised by a Methodist minister of Kentucky.

Connecticut, on the recommendation of Gov. Baldwin, holds her Annual Thanksgiving on Thursday, Nov. 28th.

EIGHT DAYS LATER FROM ENGLAND.

The steamship Great Western arrived at New York on Saturday evening bringing Liverpool dates to the 12th inst. The news is not important.

There was a tremendous storm in Ireland on the 8th and 9th inst. in which several lives were lost. Probably the same storm which was felt here on the 6th.

A Treaty has been concluded between France and Morocco.

On the 8th inst. Dr. Symons, who was opposed by the Puseyites, was elected Vice Chancellor of Oxford University by a vote of 882 to 183.

Letters from Naples say that they expect another eruption of Vesuvius. The crater is full of lava, and the fountains and springs no longer give their usual supply of water.

Louis Phillippe in England.—The King of the French and suit embarked at Treport for England on the evening of the 7th inst. and at daybreak the following morning the French fleet approached the English coast, and the inhabitants of Portsmouth, the great naval port of England, were early on the look-out for it, and made every necessary preparation for the reception of the distinguished visitors. Soon afterwards, Prince Albert and the Duke of Wellington reached Portsmouth and were most cordially received by his Majesty on board the Gomer. From the time he set foot on British soil until he found himself in the royal apartments at Windsor Castle, his progress resembled very much an ovation. The meeting of the Sovereigns was of the most affectionate character, without any formal or cold ceremonial greetings. When the King alighted he embraced her Majesty in a most cordial manner, and immediately giving her his arm, proceeded towards the great staircase, where he met the Duchess of Kent, who was accompanied by the Countess of Gainsborough, and the ladies in waiting.

The King of the French, through his Excellency Count Latour Maubourgh, French Ambassador at the Court of Rome, caused a liberal donation to be presented to the commission constituted in that city for the purpose of the erection of a monument to the memory of the celebrated poet Tasso.

The King's visit to England is distinguished by an act of royal clemency—an ordinance, which gives grace and pardon to fifty political state prisoners. All whose term of imprisonment expires before 1847, and a few of those condemned for a longer time, will receive the benefit of this arrangement. The prisoners to be liberated are for the most part obscure persons, implicated in the insurrection of the 12th and 13th of May, 1839, in Paris; in the republican plot of Marseilles; the expedition of Louis Napoleon to Boulogne; and the attempt of Quenisset rgainst the lives of the Dukes of Orleans and Aumale.

The Augsburgh Gazette mentions the probability of a matrimonial alliance between Prince George of Cambridge and the Grand Duchess Olga of Russia—one of the results of the late journey to England of the Russian Czar. The young Prince is heir presumptive to the crown of Hanover.

General Uminski, who took so distinguished a part in the late Polish insurrection, attempted to commit suicide last month at Spa, where he has been residing some time in great poverty. Being arrested for a trifling debt, he opened a vein in each arm, and had almost bled to death when discovered.

Ireland.—The liberater has fixed on Wednesday the 20*th* of November, for a grand banquet in Limerick, on his way from Darrynane to Dublin.

The chairman, and all the Protestant guardians of the North Dublin Union, have vacated their seats at the board, in consequence of the commissioners insisting on the Roman Catholic schoolmistress being paid the same salary as the Protestant mistress.

Frightful Inundation in Sweden.—Letters from Stockholm of the 24th ult. represent nearly all the Swedish provinces to have suffered severely from inundation, but in the greatest degree the country bordering on the river Roeyo, which rose thirteen feet in less than an hour, rushing in torrents upon the large village of Konradslout and its environs, which were quickly submerged, sweeping away all the houses and factories, and twenty-two windmills, and in fact leaving nothing but a mass of ruins. About 500 perished, and the loss is estimated at 800,000 rix dollars, and 1,200,000 francs. Subscriptions for the relief of the sufferers have been opened at Stockholm, at the head of which stand the names of the King and Queen, with considerable contributions annexed.

From Buenos Ayres.—We have the British Packet newspaper to the 21st August. Col. Mangini, of the army of Rosas, had a brush with one of the Montevidean outposts, very near the town, on the 29th, and the Packet represents that the Montevideans were defeated with the loss of 100 killed and wounded.

Some of the Montevideans had succeeded in cutting out a number of vessels at the Busen by means of armed launches. They had recently captured a Spanish polacca, and they were so far encouraged in their enterprise as to be fitting out numerous small vesssels for the same purpose.

There were late accounts from Rio Janeiro, and the Packet says that rumors of war between Brazil and the Argentine government had wholly subsided. It also says that the Brazilian government had forbidden Paz and his associates to quit the capital, and that the Montevidean Colonel Caceres had been taken out of the Brazilian steamer at Rio Janeiro just as he was leaving for Rio Grande. Important from Mexico—Release of the Perote Prisoners.—By way of Havana we have advices from Vera Cruz up to the 30th September, being 18 days later than we have received direct. They were taken to Havana by the British Royal Mail steamer Trent. Quite the most important intelligence received is the release of the 104 remaining Texan prisoners confined in the Castle of Perote. The glad event took place on the 16th ult. We hail it with unaffected pleasure. It not only restores to freedom a hundred hearts, as brave as ever beat, but will relieve a painful solicitude in their behalf existing in the minds of hundreds of relatives and friends, both in Texas and the United States. We presume this act of clemency is due to Santa Ana, whose heart (having been quite recently wounded by a severe domestic affliction) may have sought fitting alleviation in this deed of mercy. We may shortly expect the cutter Woodbury at this port, and, we presume, with many of these poor prisoners on board.

In no portion of the news received by the way of Havana do we find any mention made of the preparations against Texas, nor do we learn that the Chambers have taken any further step towards raising the $4,000,000 voted for the war. From the retirement, however temporary, of Santa Ana, and the recall of Canalizo, we are more and more convinced that the President sees the hopelessness of a contest with the Republic of "the Lone Star."

Hurricane at Havana.—An Extra of the New Orleans Tropic, dated Oct. 15, gives full particulars of a destructive hurricane which visited Havana on the night of October 4. It is stated that scarcely a single house in the city altogether escaped injury.

During the next day almost every establishment remained closed; the streets and squares were deserted; the distribution of periodicals and bread were retarded till late in the afternoon. In the market there was nothing—no milk, meat, or provisions of any kind. When the hurricane was over, the city continued to present the appearance of a place that had been bombarded and sacked. Doors and windows that remained were found shut, and only through sections of the doors and windows (loopholes) might a face be seen, anxiously watching to learn if the war of the elements was over. Wherever the eye was cast were seen rubbish, boughs and trunks of trees, sprouts, window-frames, houses propped up, windows and doors forced out, turrets broken, walls demolished, and habitations overflowed.

The destruction among the shipping was great. In Matanzas the hurricane commenced on the 4th, and continued with scarcely any interruption until night. A great many dwellings, molasses and sugar houses, were blown down, and scarcely a roof in the place escaped the effects of the gale.

The gale of the 4th inst. was severely felt at Key West. A schooner arrived at Mobile on 17th inst. the Captain of which informed Capt. A. that all the buildings and wharves received more or less damage.

Shipwreck—Twenty-one Lives Lost.—The brig Saratoga, Captain Bedell, of and from New York for Apalachicola, with an assorted cargo, was totally lost off Orange Key, 3d inst. The S. during a severe gale on the 3d inst. at 7 A. M. struck a ledge of rocks to the leeward of Orange Key, and immediately went over; on sounding the pumps found she had sprung a leak, immediately wore round, when she struck again; fearing she would go off again and sink in deep water, let go both anchors, and after pumping all day, at 7 P. M. she went down.

Another.—The brig Mentor, of Boston, bound for Guadaloupe encountered a storm on the 7th inst., which blew away all her sail. After the hurricane had abated, the wreck, with eight persons on board, was drifted about for thirteen days, when the sufferers were taken off by another ship.

Speedy Arrest.—Yesterday intelligence was received in this city by the Electro-Magnetic Telegraph, that a man named William Hays had absconded from the U. S. ship Pennsylvania, at Norfolk, after obtaining sundry goods upon false pretences in the name of Lieut. Porter, to the amount of some $600 or $700. This information was immediately communicated to different police officers, and in less than half an hour after it was received, Mr. Zell, of the firm of Hays, Zell & Co. succeeded in arresting the individual.

Explosion.—We have been informed, says the Reading Gazette, that another explosion occurred on the railroad, near Port Clinton, a few days ago, under precisely similar circumstances with the one which occasioned the disastrous loss of life on the 2d of September last, and which Dr. Lardner, in a very laborious report, attributed to the effect of lightning. The engine had taken in its supply of water, and had a heavy pressure of steam, when the engineer discovered by a peculiar hissing, that an explosion was about to take place, and at once leaped from it and passed down the embankment. He had scarcely done so, when the boiler exploded, scattering the machinery in all directions; but very fortunately, no one was injured. Weakness of the stays across the fire box is supposed to be the cause of the explosion.

Shocking Accident.—The steamboat Julia Walker, exploded her boilers on the Ohio river a few days since, by which from fifty to seventy lives were lost. The boat was on her way to New Orleans, with a full load of passengers. Towards evening some parts of the machinery became disordered, and while the steam was shut off to repair it, her three large boilers exploded, scattering fragments of the boat, and the bodies of men in every direction.

The New State Prison Located.—We learn that the Governor, Comptroller and Attorney General, have decided to purchase the Mines of Gen. Skinner, in Clinton county, as a site for the new State Prison. These mines are situated about fourteen miles in a direct line nearly west of Plattsburgh, and about three miles from the Saranac river; and are admirably adapted to the important public purpose for which they have been secured by the state.

It will be recollected that we have already announced the complete success of the experiment made under the direction of the Commissioner, Ransom Cook, Esq., and in the presence of the Governor, Comptroller and Attorney General.

We congratulate the people of the state, and particularly the mechanics, who have so long sought for this important measure of justice to them and advantage to the public interests, and have at length obtained it. [Albany Argus, 24th.

The number of lives supposed to have been lost from vessels and steamers during the gale, as near as we can learn, is as follows: Steamer Fulton, (wrecked) 3; steamer St. Louis, 3; schr. Penn sylvania, (supposed) 10; schr. Marcy, (supposed) 5; sail boat, (British) 13; schr. Biddle, (Mate)—Total, 35. [Buffalo Gaz. Oct. 23.

Destructive Fire in Providence—Russell's Planetarium Burnt.—About one o'clock on Friday morning a fire broke out in the theatre on Dorrance street, Providence, the interior of which was entirely consumed. The stone walls are alone left standing. We understand there was no insurance on the theatre.

We are pained to add, that the splendid Planetarium, built by Russell of Ohio, the property of Messrs. Haswell & Robinson, and a great number of paintings, valuable views and diograms, the collection of years, belonging to Dr. Lardner, together with a microscope, were destroyed; the fire burnt so fast that nothing could be removed from the theatre.

The loss of the Planetarium and the apparatus belonging to Dr. Lardner, a part of which cannot be replaced, was stated at $20,000. The Planetarium was insured for $8,000.

It is not known how the fire originated. The last of a course of lectures by Dr. Lardner was delivered in the theatre last evening, and his men were in the building packing the apparatus for removal, until 12 o'clock, about one hour before the fire was discovered; they were very careful to put out the lights, and left, as they thought, every thing safe. [Providence Journal.

Niagara Falls, Oct. 19.

The report that the stranger who was missed at the Table Rock (Canada side.) some weeks since was drowned, is confirmed. His body was yesterday discovered a few feet above the "Mansion Rock," near the Whirlpool.

His head was gone, and body otherwise very much decomposed. His head is supposed to have caught between some rocks, thus accounting for its loss, and the time he was in the water befere his body was found. He was decently interred, below the bank, near the water's edge.

Sudden Death.—A melancholy accident occurred on Monday morning, near Babcock's mills, in Scott. Mr. Horace Phillips and Mr. Chauncey Babcock, son of Dea. Solomon Babcock, were engaged in digging sand, when the bank suddenly gave way and buried Mr. B. about three feet under the earth. Mr. Phillips gave the alarm, and help was immediately on the ground. Mr. B. was soon disinterred, but he was dead. [Skaneateles Columbian.

Earthquake in Western New York.—On Tuesday morning last a very perceptible shock of an earthquake was experienced in the towns of Alden, Albion, Alexander, Attica, Batavia, Bethany, Darien and Elba, in this State. Mr. Follett, assistant Postmaster at Batavia, says the shock was felt there at 7 minutes past 8, and lasted about two seconds. A gentleman from Elba estimates the shock in that place at a half a minute, and describes it as hard enough to jar open several doors, it came apparently from the South-West, and passed to the North-East. SUMMARY.

The Maine Methodist Conference have decided that it is highly improper for their members to join the Odd Fellows or any other secret society.

The Hon. Thomas N. Morgan, of New Orleans, died at Nashville, Tenn. of consumption, on the 3d instant.

James C. Cook was killed at Columbus, Ga., week before last, by being dashed against a tree by his runaway horse.

On Saturday, between 300 and 400 dollars and a promissory note was stolen out of the fire-proof safe in the store of Henry Grove & Son, in North Third street, Philadelphia.

The loss by the storm at Dunkirk is estimated by the Beacon at $50,000.

Mr. Lebanon Stokes, a farmer of Baton Rouge, La., was recently shot dead in his own house by some unknown person.

Senator Benton and other persons conversant with the affairs of Texas, estimate the debt of that country at $25,000,000.

The gold mine in Coosa county of Alabama, owned by Mr. Caldwell, it is said, promises to be very valuable.

A singular mineral ore has been found in Shelby county, Alabama, which is thought to contain a large per cent. of silver.

Samuel Oscar Pritchett, an apprentice in the Pensacola Gazette office, and brother-in-law of the editor, died a few days ago of lockjaw. While exerting himself in clearing away the ruins of the late fire, a nail lacerated the sole of his foot, which combined with a cold from exposure, brought on lockjaw, of which he died in less than forty-eight hours.

On the 14th inst. a fire broke out in the Alabama penitentiary at Wetumpka, which is thougnt to have been the work of one of the convicts, with the hope to escape; no escapes, however, took place. The sheds and shops upon the south line were entirely consumed, together with a large quantity of tan bark, some carriages, a turning lathe, and divers other articles. The loss is estimated at from $2000 to $4000.

John R. Peters, Jr. of this city, is engaged in collecting a Chinese Museum, to be located in New York, and to contain a more complete representation of the arts and peculiarities of that people than the famous one of Mr. Dunn in London.

Further accounts continue to be received of the effects of the hurricane at Buffalo and farther west. They show an immense destruction of property. The number of lives lost, however, does not appear to be so great as at first stated, though it is very large.

The propeller Emigrant, with a cargo of 900 bushels of wheat, from Chicago is ashore at Goderich, C. W. Several other vessels are ashore at different points on the lake.

Accounts of the storm about Key West on the 4th inst., mention the loss of several vessels and some lives.

A New York ship was burnt at New Orleans on the 20th inst. Loss estimated at $120,000.

The Van Buren (Ark.) Intelligencer of October 5th, says: "We learn from a gentleman just from Texas, that the inhabitants of the north eastern portion of Texas are suffering greatly for want of provisions, and that the water in that region has almost totally failed. Large numbers of emigrants are returning through this place to Missouri, that went out last winter and spring.

In the United States the annual value of all manufactured paper is $511,600. The number of persons employed in it is about 5000. The number of printing offices is supposed to be at least 1600; the number of men employed in printing and binding is about 12,000, and the capital is nearly six millions of dollars. The whole number of our newspapers and periodicals is a little less than 1,700.

Snuff-taking in England took its rise from the capture of vast quantities of the article in George Rooke's expedition to Spain, in 1702. The prize of the forces was sold in England, and gave rise to a habit now general, and it yields a million a year to the revenue. It is said to be useful only to those disposed to apoplexy, increasing the secretions, and acting like a seton. There are about one hundred and twenty several sorts in some of the London shops for sale.

A French paper says that the Agricultural Society of the Var has addressed a memorial to the Prefect of that Department, entreating him to prevent rigorously the shooting of sparrows and other smaller birds, their value in destroying insects far exceeding that of the grain which they consume.

There is now lying at New-York, a steam propeller vessel which is being loaded for China.—Another vessel of the same character is also at New York, which is being fitted out for the Sultan of Constantinople.

No liquor is allowed to be carried on board of the New York and Stonington line of steamboats by any of the stewards or waiters, on pain of dismissal.

A writer in the Houston Star calculates that the debt of Texas amounts to $100 per head for every man, woman and child in the Republic.

We cheerfully give place to the following Circular, and ask that its request for information may receive attention. The invitation is unlimited, and we shall look anxiously for the practical proof of a corresponding liberality.

CIRCULAR

To the Friends of the Lord's Day.

The object of this communication is to secure the general attendance of Delegates from every section of our country, at the National Lord's Day Convention, which, in pursuance of a previous call, is to be held in Baltimore on Wednesday, the 27th day of November next: and to invite the active co-operation of all the friends of the Sabbath in procuring the appointment and attendance of Delegates, and furnishing the Convention with the statistical information hereinafter called for.

The proposition to hold such a Convention, originally suggested by the Philadelphia Sabbath Association, has been sanctioned by the Sabbath Convention of Maryland, Delaware and the District of Columbia; by the American and Foreign Sabbath Union, through their Secretary, Rev. Dr. Edwards; by the State Conventions of Pennsylvania, and New York, and the Charleston Sabbath Association.

A National Convention held under such circumstances, cannot, we are convinced, fail to exert a momentous influence, either favorable or unfavorable, upon the cause. If it shall be characterized by numbers, influence and interest commensurate with the transcendant importance of the object for which it is to be convened, viz., The suppression, as far and as early as practicable, by moral influence, under the Divine blessing, of the profanation of God's holy day, throughout our land;—its beneficent effects will be felt not only by the present, but by all future generations.

We confidently hope that in all these respects, the character of the Convention will fully correspond with the magnitude of the interests involved; and that it may be made truly national in its character, by the attendance of Delegates from every section, however remote, of our country.

Let the distant cities and districts send at least one Delegate to manifest their heartfelt co-operation and sympathy.

Renewing, therefore, the invitation which had already been very extensively circulated, we invite all to attend:—

We invite Ministers of the Gospel to lay this subject before their congregations, and procure the appointment of large delegations: We invite the citizens of every election district to assemble in primary capacity, and appoint Delegates: We invite all merchants, professional men, agriculturists, manufacturers and mechanics, to attend personally, or send representatives. And lastly, though not least, we cordially and earnestly invite officers and stock holders in canals, rail-roads, steam-boats and stage-lines, forwarders, agents, clerks, conductors, boatmen, drivers and all others concerned in the carriage of persons or goods, or connected with the shipping interests, to attend and take part in the deriberations of the Convention.

Let all come that the views, feelings and interests of none may be overlooked, and that the wants and welfare of all classes may be considered and promoted.

With a view of collecting a mass of statistics full, exact and well-authenticated, to be systematically arranged and laid before the Convention when it assembles, we respectfully request the friends of the Sabbath to whom this address shall come, to furnish us by a letter addressed to "The Sabbath Association, Baltimore, Md." at as early a day as practicable, with exact answers to the following queries, viz.,

1. What Railroads or Canals, stages or steamboat lines are in operation in the State or section of country in which you reside? What is their extent?
2. Are they used upon the Sabbath for the carriage either of passengers or merchandize?
3. If so, what ratio does the Sabbath travel and transportation bear to that of the other days of the week? and what are the relative receipts?
4. Is the transportation of the mail assigned as a prominent reason for the Sabbath use of any of these modes of conveyance?
5. Do the proprietors deem their employment on the Sabbath to be profitable in a pecuniary view?
6. Are the proprietors willing or unwilling to discontinue Sunday travel on their lines?
7. What are the sentiments of those employed on these routes, touching the suspension of Sabbath labor?
8. Has the carriage either of passengers or merchandize on the Sabbath been discontinued on any of these routes? if so, to what extent? And what have been the consequences, 1st, in reference to the morals of those employed; 2d, in reference to the pecuniary results?
9. What is the present state of public sentiment in your vicinity, in respect to the observance of the Lord's day, compared with that of former years?
10. Have any special efforts been made to promote its sanctification? and with what success?

[Delegates are requested, on their arrival, to report themselves at the Lecture room of the Fifth Presbyterian Church, (Rev. Mr. Hamner's,) in Hanover street, between Pratt and Lombard sts.; where a committee of reception will be in waiting to secure them accommodations.]

DIED,

In Denmark, Jefferson Co. N. Y., on the 10th of September, Mrs. Malvina Metcalf, aged 39 years.—Mrs. Metcalf was the daughter of Mr. Reynolds Greenman, formerly of Stephentown, Rensselaer Co. N. Y. In early life she became a disciple of Jesus, and a member of the 1st Seventh-Day Baptist Church in Brookfield, in which she adorned her profession by a godly life, until she removed to a distant section of the country. In her latter days, she manifested an unusual degree of engagedness in the cause of religion, and she has given her friends every desirable evidence that for her "to die is gain."

In Brookfield, on the 10th inst., Alice Cornelia, daughter of Ransom Lewis, aged 4 years.

THE CHILD AND DEW-DROP.

FROM THE GERMAN.

A little child, that like some flowers,
Seemed made for fairer climes than ours,
Grieved that the sun had chased away
The dew that on his garden lay.
Full oft he watched the flowers at night,
That sparkled in the moonbeam's light;
And though in early morn they shone,
Ere noon-day came the dew had flown!
The sun would chase the drops away,
Or swallow them with fiery ray.
Just after he this moaning made,
The rain fell on his flowery bed;
And when it ceased, the rainbow's dye
Appeared across the tranquil sky!

"Now," said the father to his son,
"Behold these dew-drops, one by one,
Appear reset; a glittering train,
To gem the heavens, whence first they came!
Be taught, my child, nought withers here,
But bright in heaven, 'twill re-appear."

Alas, 'twas so! ere the sun's light
Exhaled the dew-drops of the night,
This boy to God his soul had given,
Lucid and pure, as dews of heaven!

EXTRACTS FROM A DISCOURSE,

Delivered at the National Scotch Church, Regent's Square, before the "London Society for the Protection of Young Females."

"DO THEY NOT ERR THAT DEVISE EVIL? BUT MERCY AND TRUTH SHALL BE TO THEM THAT DEVISE GOOD." Prov. 14:22.

Do they not err that devise evil? The innocent may be overtaken in a fault, passion and bad advice may lead the unwary astray; but it is not of such that the Spirit of Truth speaks here; he points to presumptuous sinners, grey-haired veterans in crime. These are they who plan what others execute—Jeroboams, not only giants in wickedness, but who make others sin; cold-blooded Balaams, who suggest systems of seduction; mighty hunters, like Nimrod, and their prey is man. Theirs is the serpent's cunning, and theirs too will be the serpent's fate; on their belly they go in degradation and vileness, dust they eat and are not satisfied; and with the old serpent, the father of lies and first seducer, their portion shall be for ever.

Wise though they are to devise evil, God will take them in their own craftiness; and in the net which they hid, their own feet shall be snared. They fall by the dread retaliation of those whom they seduced, as Balaam before the sword of Israel; and, though no dog or fowl of the air should eat their flesh, like that of Jeroboam, yet are they in the vengeful hand of Him, who said, "I will take away the remnant of the house of Jeroboam till it be all away."

These are they who have reduced seduction to a science; the common mob of the depraved are only tools in the hands of these modern encyclopedists of the French Revolution; these are the huge distillers of wickedness, while they who hang in infamy by our corners are only bar-maids, doling out temptation by the glass; and however they may have escaped men's vengeance, or the arm of human law, however they may have said in their heart, "I shall never be in adversity," yet, in the day of the manifestation of the righteous judgment of God, they shall be pre-eminent in misery as they were in crime; and a just judge will, in a way worthy of Omnipotence, display his wrath on these vessels of wrath, and make his power known.

How different from these Ahitophels in fate, as well as in character, are they who devise good! These are the salt of the earth preserving it from corruption. With ten such citizens, even Sodom is safe. Like Elijah and Elisha, they are the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof. These are they whose hearts are devoted to the good of their species, the authors and prime movers of benevolent enterprise: the Howard, the Raikes, the Clarkson, the Wilberforce, of their day. Their sphere is not, however, always on high, nor are they necessarily of the distinguished and great; the poor wise man may, by his wisdom, deliver the city, though no man remember that same poor man. Whether, however, the wise heart devise good, with Moses at the head of Israel's host, or with the Israelitish maid in the service of Naaman, the assurance of the text will be perfectly fulfilled. It is not a Williams, a Morrison, a Carey, alone, who, in the sublime sphere of god-like enterprise, enjoy the bliss which benevolence imparts, and mercy and truth as their portion. The humblest godly superintendant of a Sunday school reaps an abundant harvest from the seed which his own hand has sown; receives, in the success of his own benevolent plans, a rich reward; and shall he not be satisfied with Christ's likeness, when the great Judge shall say, "Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

* * * * *

1st.—The EVIL against which we contend, is one which the denunciations of the Spirit of Inspiration have raised to a terrific and bad eminence. "Flee fornication," they say, "every sin that a man doeth is without the body, but he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body. For this ye know, that no whoremonger nor unclean person hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God." He whom fatal experience taught, and whom the Spirit of Truth guided, declares of the house of the harlot, "That the dead are there, and her guests in the depths of hell."

The sin against the seventh commandment was that for which there fell of the children of Israel in one day, three and twenty thousand; and though no miracle of vengeance treads in its footsteps now, yet on the brow of no crime has God more clearly set the brand of his curse, and none does he pursue with a more terrific and exterminating scourge. He has connected it with disease, pestiferous and loathesome, which, in the Lock Hospital, shuts out its victim from association with the rest of the species. Under its weight, the wretch, once so full of life, sinks to the grave with his bones full of the sins of his youth, leaving an influence behind him to curse posterity when he is gone; and to broken-hearted parents,—

"One fatal remembrance, one sorrow that throws
Its bleak shade alike o'er our joys and our woes;
To which life nothing darker or brighter can bring,
For which joy has no balm, and affliction no sting."

God has given mankind one of the noblest evidences of his goodness and wisdom in setting the solitary in families. The bliss of the family relation, of the family altar, and the circle of love at home, is among the purest which man enjoys. But what is all that bliss to the base seducer? A father's heart may be broken, a mother may hide in the grave grief which "knew not consolation's name," honor and joy may be for ever banished from a lovely family, but what does the seducer care? In the course of a few weeks two girls applied to me who had fallen a prey to the same man. I wrote to the old reprobate respecting one of them, and he coolly replied, that he was happy she had obtained a protector; but he was unconscious of impropriety towards her, as he would have kept her decently, had he not found her drunk when he visited her. The heartless ruffian first destroyed her moral principle, taught her to drink for his vile ends, and then, forsooth, in the spotless purity of his morals, he could not endure her to practice the lesson which she learned from him.

In a small village, where ten sisters in four families are courtezans, I know of four sisters who support their father, mother, and younger brother, by the wages of iniquity. They became what they are now—wretched, debased, defiled,—by the agency of a grey-haired grandfather, and that grandfather, a magistrate! A few years since they were virtuous, modest, respectable; but so degraded are they now, that their appearance in church one Sunday filled the clergyman with such disgust that he came down from the desk and drove them out of the door. Yet degraded as they are, and detestable as are their crimes, are they not objects of sincerest pity? A judgment day alone shall reveal the falsehoods, the base arts, the hellish wiles, by which they were led astray. They were innocent and lovely once; alas! what are they now?

"They grew in beauty side by side,
They filled one home with glee;"

had they kept their virtue, what though—

"Their graves were severed, far and wide,
By mountain, stream, and sea.

"The same fond mother bent, at night,
O'er each fair sleeping brow;
She had each folded flower in sight,—
Where are those dreamers now?"

Let the seducer answer where? they may pass away to wretchedness, beyond the sphere of his knowledge; they may be transported as felons, to groan and die on a foreign shore; they may find a watery grave, like the two daughters of a Manchester merchant, who, forsaken and starving, threw themselves from London-bridge; but however far they may wander in misery, or wherever in disgrace and corruption their bones may lie, the resurrection morning will call them forth to confront their seducer in His presence, whose spirit has said,—"Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge."

But why dwell longer on the nature of the evil, than simply to remind you, that three of its leading features are, —First—the sore and lamentable circumstances in the case of the victim of seduction, is not the violation of her person, the loss of the inestimable jewel—female virtue, but the perversion of the mind, the loss of moral principle; to ruin the body, the seducer must ruin the soul. Second—the victim of seduction becomes herself an active agent in temptation, and spreads around exterminating havoc. Third—the vile appetite grows by what it feeds on; it busies itself inventing more abominable modes of gratification; and, like the wild beast who murders for the love of destruction, it multiplies victims, without the hope of a new pleasure. Assuredly the seducer "is as death, and cannot be satisfied, and enlargeth his desires as hell."

* * * * *

After giving some statistics of vice in London, the writer adds—

Their situation is most degraded I acknowledge; but surely it is not hopeless. They are ignorant, for of 3,000 on whom an experiment was tried, 1,700 could neither read nor write. They are destitute of religion: one of them replied mournfully, when asked in jest by a constable who accompanied me, if the tattered book she read in her sick bed was her prayers? "No, no, novels are my prayers." They are companions of the most atrocious felons; so that two-thirds of those convicted for crime are in league with them. The amount stolen in Liverpool in 1838, by fifteen classes of thieves, did not equal by one-fourth, that stolen by courtezans alone. They are proverbially addicted to lying: they are almost without exception drunkards; they wander abroad to destroy, as the pestilence walking in darkness; their house is the way to death; their steps take hold on hell; and yet, after having granted all this respecting these lonely and forsaken things, I cannot unite with my country's bard, and say—

"The clouds passed soon from the chaste cold moon,
And heaven smiled again with her vestal flame;
But none will see the day when the clouds shall pass away,

Notwithstanding their wickedness and vileness, look to their situation, and say, are they wholly unworthy of pity? have they placed themselves beyond the sphere, where, according to Christ's definition, our neighbor dwells?

When I hear men who make pretensions to piety, giving as an apology for shutting up their bowels of compassion from an erring sister, that her case is hopeless, I am tempted to reply, with indignation—"Publicans and harlots go into the kingdom of God before you." Of 5,183 prostitutes, whose cases were minutely examined, 1,441 had been reduced to their vicious state by sheer destitution. It was proved respecting one such, that she had not tasted food for three days; 1,255 were orphans, or had been abandoned by their parents; 66 had commenced their trade in infamy to procure support for aged parents or younger brothers or sisters; 189 were servants, reduced by their masters, and then turned out of doors; and the melancholy and enormous number, 1,425, were beguiled, befooled wretches, who had believed the promises and all the views of such false hearted villains as the great magician describes, when he says,—

"Where shall the traitor rest?
He, the deceiver,
Who would win maiden's breast,
Ruin, and leave her."

Let him therefore that thinketh he standeth, take heed, lest he fall; remembering the saying of the old worthy when he saw a felon led to execution,—"There, but for the grace of God, goes John Bunyan." Were these hapless victims worse than others by nature, and driven by appetite? Did they rush to the embrace of the destroyer? Duchatalet, a high authority, says, "that libertinism in the female is so rarely a cause of her degradation, that he never found one well-authenticated instance." And how did they fall? Love to a father or mother, or sister or brother; —the love of life, the fear of death, even in its worst forms, is no apology for crime: but, before you turn away with a cold heart from a sister weeping in the bitterness of unfeigned penitence for having submitted to a degradation which she loathed, to save from death a starving mother, look into your own bosoms, I beseech you, and ask yourselves, had a God of Mercy turned away from you, where would you have been now?

While you think of your fallen sister's crime, think too of her temptations and her horrible slavery; think of the system of luxurious living and excitement, which perhaps you have helped onward; think of the theatre, which perhaps you have helped patronize; think of the vanity of dress, of which perhaps you have yourself been a victim; think of the spirit trade with all its seductive customs, and fatal temptations, of which perhaps you have been a supporter; and, above all, think of that most profligate and infamous public sentiment and public practice, which, while they sentence the victim of seduction to hopeless infamy, cherish in the first society, and court in the highest circles, the notorious, accursed seducer; think seriously and prayerfully on all this, and, if you can satisfy yourself that you have had no share in your sister's ruin, if you have thrown no temptation in her way, if you have set her no bad example, if you have helped, as you should, to train her up in the fear of the Lord, if you can look forward without fear, to meeting her at the judgment seat of Christ,—if you are perfectly clear and safe in all this, and if, in addition to it all, you have no sympathy for the distressed, and no assistance for the deserted and poor, then keep your money and your tears; pass by, like the Priest and Levite, on the other side, and permit the good Samaritan to do as he may please.

Dear friends, let no feelings of romance turn you away from the disgusting creatures, who hang shivering and hopeless by the corners of your streets; think not of what they are, but of what they were:—they were sisters and daughters, loving and loved; there are those among them who bore the sacred name of mother, and there are men in the cold grave, who rejoiced over them as the wives of their youth. Foul seducer, who made them what they are? I have known so much of seduction, as to condense on it, and not on its bleeding victims, all my hatred and all my scorn. I have known the gay girl, innocent as a lamb, enticed away by an old satanic procuress in hope of a pleasant party, and then besotted and drugged till she fell an easy prey. I have known of the vile scoundrel, acting as pimp for a justice of the peace, who, while dispensing law, had marked the lamb for sacrifice. I have known of this tempting basilisk luring his victim with professions of honorable love; and when she awoke to consciousness from his stupifying draught, finding herself hopeless, and ruined, and lost. I have, alas, known so much of the ways of those who devise evil, as to have no doubt of the truth of a statement made on high authority, that when a veteran in crime waited in a vestibule of hell for a new gratification, by the slaughter of a new victim, there was ushered in to him his own young daughter!

When such are the means employed by those who devise evil, when such are the scenes through which the victims of seduction pass, need we be surprised at the statement made by a physician of a lunatic asylum, that more than one half of its female cases originated in the remorse of helpless beings who had lost their virtue. One poor maniac, who preserved a dead silence, except when alone, kept continually crying then, "Alas, alas, that I bade farewell to virtue; how can I bear contempt, how can I live in degradation and ruin?"

You surely would not pronounce a poor girl's case hopeless if, with Duchatalet, you overheard her exclaim to her approving fellow prisoners, as she looked up to the clear blue sky,—"Oh, how good God is to send this weather to such as we!" Cold theory may pronounce such a case hopeless, while looking only to the strength of evil habit, to vile words and acts, and companions viler still; but, to judge of the practicability of reforming erring sisters, you must come near them with words and deeds of kindness, in the penitentiary and the prison-cell; and, there, where compassion unlocks the heart and gives vent to smothered feeling, you will find with joy, what I have found many a happy time, that there is not a stubborn wretch among them all but words and deeds of kindness will melt down.

* * * * * *

All the empty joys of debauchery cannot cure the wounded heart of the lone wanderer from virtue and from home; the green grass plot of her girlish days is in her dreams, as she sleeps in her garret on a truss of straw; the cheerful notes of young warm hearts are in her ears, amidst wild uproar; she hears, in imagination, still, her father's trembling voice, as he reads God's word by the peaceful hearth; still on her aching head she feels, at midnight hour, her mother's hand in prayer; and is the prodigal child to be a homeless outcast still?

"The haunts of virtue meet her anxious sight,
In all their glow of loveliness and light;
Madly she feels no home for her is there,
And turns away in anguish and despair."

But why dwell longer on scenes of deplorable wretchedness? I visited last night by scores, your largest and lowest dens of infamy, in the neighborhood of Whitechapel, Spitelsfields, and Ratcliff Highway, and saw scenes of horror which no tongue should tell. I have visited nearly all the dreary abodes of the daughters of crime and misery in Belfast, and seen most of them to be wrecks and hovels unfit for the abode of any living being. I have marked the ravages which the most loathesome and horrible disease that scourges wickedness makes on the tender female frame. I have seen the mother mistress of the house in which her own daughter earned for her the wages of infamy, while her son, in the next door, presided in a similar den of shame. I have seen assembled in one room, twenty-six ruined victims, one-half of whom were from nine to fourteen, and not one of whom was above seventeen years of age. I have heard, at midnight, screams from some den, like that of the convict at the late Antrim Assizes, sentenced to be hanged for beating one of her inmates to death with a stool;—and while witnessing all this, and far more, I have reflected, that ten short years, on an average, close the mortal career of them all; that thousands known to the police are but as a handful compared with the whole mass of the polluted; and that all the horrors of the stigmatized brothel, and of unblushing prostitution sink into insignificance, when compared with the unspeakable ills of secret lewdness—when put in comparison with scences where the young and immature are the chief victims; where licentiousness pays its highest price, and plays its deepest game; and where sons of Belial sold to crime, transfer to earth the deadliest orgies of hell.

* * * * * *

A MOVING APPEAL.—With such facts before you, brethren, dare you join in the unbelieving heartless cry,—"There is no hope for the victim of seduction?" Is it the fitness of Gospel truth you doubt? Would you cast suspicion over the sufficiency of the Saviour's atonement, or the omnipotence of his grace? Who is this that casts forth, in doubts, the ice of his unbelief? Has he read the history of Moravian Missions? Does he know what Whitfield did in Cornwall? Has he read the speech of Williams to the Common Council of London? Does he know that the caste of the Hindoos is broken? Has he gazed round the London Missionary Society's Museum, and seen in the prostrate Dagons of Paganism, the triumphs of the God of truth? What Canute is this, who sitting before the roll of ocean, dares say to the advancing tide of moral reform—"Hitherto shalt thou come, and no farther." What heartless sceptic is this, who dares forbid reformation to the sisterhood of sorrow, and prevent their regaining the empire of refinement, tenderness, and love; and once more, in the domestic sphere of woman's high destiny, sitting enthroned in the hearts of husbands and of children? Oh, brethren, there is a reckless condemnation of the poor prostitute, in a spirit with which we should have no sympathy; there is a cruel cold-blooded crew, who, after having, like Judah, been partners in the fallen females crime, cry, like Judah, when the Tamar's shame was published, "Bring her forth, and let her be burned."

This is not the spirit of Him who said to the woman taken in adultery, "go and sin no more;" this is not the spirit of His religion, who, on behalf of the daughters of sorrow, and their benefactors, has so fully verified the truth of our text—"Mercy and truth shall be to them that devise good."

Christian friends, you appear to-day, as the advocates of female virtue, the friends of woman, for, however degraded man's avarice and passion may make her, she was fitted by infinite wisdom and goodness, for being the companion of him, who was created in the image of God; she commands man's heart, she holds in her hands the property and destiny of millions, and of millions more; whatever may be the feebleness of her nature, or the multitude of her temptations, she is the last, and best, and noblest work of God. "Houses and riches are the inheritance of fathers, but a prudent wife is from the Lord;"—and oh, who can calculate the bliss, which, in the social circle, in the Church of Christ, in the liberties and welfare of mankind, God has in store for the world, by the prudence and piety, and all the gentle influence connected with the name of mother? The sun which clothes the hills with verdure and the vallies with corn, may scorch the wilderness as with fire; the wind which breathes health in the balmy breeze, may sweep in the hurricane, or carry death in the deadly simoon: alas, that the same sex which furnished a Hannah as the mother of Samuel, an Elizabeth of John, a Mary of Jesus, should also have given a Jezebel as wife of Ahab and mother of Ahazia! Alas, that in the family circle, and even in the nurseries of kings, it should have commenced the train of evil, which, in the cabinet, and on the throne, in the battle field, and even at the very altar of God, made monsters of unspeakable wickedness, and sent them forth to destroy, like angels of death, and as scourges in the hand of an avenging God.

Woman's is a noble nature, however low it may fall. Rome, with all its paganism, had a Volumnia, to save it by her influence over her son; and even in the vileness of its degradation, a Cornelia as mother of the Gracchi;—and, though the hapless beings, who this day claim our sympathy, may be sunk below the pity, and the charity of a cold world, yet are they not sisters to a Countess of Huntingdon, a More, a Hemans, and a Graham? Did not the mothers of Augustine and Gregory, of Edwards and Payson, and Dwight and Doddridge, and Newton, belong to the same sex, and to the same family? And is it impossible for divine grace to convert their hearts, and purify their lives, to give them, as sons, the future heroes of the church of God, and enable them to train up Howards and Vanderkemps, Martyns and Brainerds for other days, when these Ruths and Salomes themselves, these Mary Magdalens and Elizabeths, and all the company of the blessed are celebrating the triumph of grace with angels in glory?

Oh, then, brethren, as you would exalt Christian London above heathen Babylon, with her compulsory law for universal prostitution,—above Pagan Rome, with her legal enactment against the Roman baroness making herself vile for hire; as you would show how far the religion of Jesus exalts woman above the degraded thing which heathenism sells as a slave to a brutal husband, and burns alive with his corpse; as you fear to increase the tide of crime, which is setting in so fast to the ocean of death; as you would multiply the number of ministering spirits, who soothe the lone heart and smooth the brow of the dying; as you value domestic peace, if,—like the great Edmund Burke, your agitated spirit is tranquilized, when you enter the loved circle of home; as you would strengthen affection to a pious mother, that last cord which holds back the profligate from utter ruin; as you would confirm the hope of regeneration for a lost world, from a mother's influence, and a mother's prayers; as you would furnish subject for the song of angels; as you wish God's glory to cover the heavens and the earth to be full of his praise;—I entreat and beseech you, to honor those whom God so highly honors by committing to them the destinies of future ages; and, while heaven blesses feeble means for promoting glorious ends, who knows what a single contribution of money or effort may effect now, what blessings it may continue to shed, when our world is burned, and our sun and our stars are no more? One sinner saved, one faithful wife, one pious sister, one godly mother given to future years, the holy savor of one sacred name, answers to petitions from one closet of effectual fervent prayer, one death bed of peace; one female voice to the heavenly choir.—O, brethren of Jesus, what a privilege, what a glory to be made fellow laborers with God in converting even one sinner from the error of her ways, and thus saving a soul from death, and hiding a multitude of sins.

From "Songs from the Parsonage."

LOVE TO CHRIST.

"Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity," Eph. iv, 24.

Do YOU LOVE CHRIST?—I ask not if you feel
The warm excitement of that party zeal
Which follows on while others lead the way,
And makes His cause the fashion of the day;
But do you love him when his garb is mean,
Nor shrink to let your fellowship be seen?
Do you love Jesus, blind, and halt, and maimed?
In prison succor him? nor feel ashamed
To own him, though his injured name may be
A mark for some dark slander's obloquy?
Do you love Jesus in the orphan's claim,
And bid the widow welcome in his name?
Say not, "When saw we him?"—Each member dear,
Poor and afflicted, wears his image here;
And if unvalued or unowned by thee,
Where can thy union with the holy be?
And if thou thus art to the body dead,
Where is thy life in Christ, the living Head?
And if dissevered from the living Vine,
How canst thou dream that thou hast life divine?

Sweet is the union true believers feel;
Into one Spirit they have drunk: the seal
Of God is on their hearts; and thus they see
In each the features of one family.
If one is suffering, all the rest is sad;
If but the least is honored, all are glad.
The grace of Jesus, which they all partake,
Flows out in mutual kindness for his sake;
Here he has left them for a while to wait,
And represent him in their suffering state;
While he, though glorified, as yet alone,
Still bears his Church before the Father's throne.

"What does Philosophy impart to man
But undiscovered wonders. Let her soar
E'en to her proudest heights—to where she caught
The soul of Newton and of Socrates,
She but extends the scope of wild amaze
And admiration. All her lessons end
In wider views of God's unfathomed depths."

FRUIT TREES FOR ORNAMENT.

If a man has but little land, it is well to ornament his grounds with fruit trees. They are not only good for ornament, but valuable in affording delicious fruit. If well arranged and kept in a neat thriving condition, they will be nearly as ornamental as any trees that are cultivated. If the apple tree produced no fruit, and it was a foreign species, it would be brought to this country and cultivated for its beautiful flowers. What trees cultivated expressly for ornament, particularly for their fine flowers, make a more noble show than the apple, the peach, and some other kinds, when gaily decked in blossoms sweet, filling the air with their fragrance? If a farmer has an abundance of land, then it is of little importance whether he cultivates fruit or forest trees around his house, as the latter may as well grow there as elsewhere, and they will in due time furnish fuel. We will give an instance of the advantage of giving preference to a fruit tree. Mr. Bowen Russell, of West Cambridge, was advised to set a forest tree for a shade near the kitchen door, but he set a Baldwin apple tree, and in eleven years from that time he took at one crop five barrels of apples. Supposing a family had no fruit trees, what an advantage one such fruit tree would be. How often would it afford a fine feast of fruit, and how many excellent dishes of food.

HARVESTING IN THE WEST.

The wholesale way in which harvesting is carried on in the broad and fertile fields of Prairie Roude, Michigan, where six thousand acres of wheat all in a body stood this year, is thus described in a letter to the N. Y. American:—

"The harvesting is done after a fashion unknown in our region of three or four acre fields. A resident of the prairie has invented a machine which he lets out at $3 per acre, which cuts the grain, thrashes it, cleans it, and puts it into a bag ready for the market. It is drawn by eight yoke of cattle, or as many pair of horses, requires the attendance of eight or ten men, and finishes from twenty to twenty-five acres a day. The cattle are beside the machine and urge it onward. As it proceeds it cuts the grain near the head, the straw being of little or no value here. This is rapidly passed through the other processes, and is turned out into a sort of hopper behind, from which it passes into a bag; that as fast as it is filled, is carried to a wagon in attendance, and replaced by others; so that wheat standing in the morning may be flour before night. All the grain and oats are thrashed by machines worked by horses, a flail being scarcely ever used."

CORN BREAD.—Take as much corn meal as you wish to cook, scald it well, by pouring boiling water over it and stirring it thoroughly; then mix it to the consistency of batter, with milk—if it is pretty rich it won't hurt it; but mind the mixing part, that it is thoroughly done, the more the better. Put in one egg, a teaspoonful of salæratus, and a tablespoonful or more of lard. Mix the whole thoroughly together, till the ingredients are entirely incorporated through the whole—mind I say the mixing, the more the better. It is now to be baked as usual, about three quarters of an hour, and you will have the finest corn bread you ever ate.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location, thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y. The fall term will open on WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 14th, under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

President of the Board of Trustees.

TERMS OF COMMUNION AT THE LORD'S TABLE.

Suggested by an article in the Seventh-day Baptist Register of 15th Nov. last, by Eld. J. Chadwick.

In regard to the terms of communion at the Lord's table, various rules are adopted by the different denominations of Christians. All, I believe, have restrictions, or limits, more or less, to the extent of their communion in this ordinance—very nearly or quite corresponding with their terms of membership. These restrictions result from the differences of opinion entertained by the several denominations of Christians respecting the doctrines and duties which constitute the religion of Jesus Christ.

When a church has become satisfied that an applicant for membership is either deficient in an evangelical experience, or rejects any particular doctrine held by the church as fundamental in the Christian faith, or is deficient in moral duty, such applicant is uniformly rejected. I think this course is pursued by all denominations holding to the celebration of this ordinance. The same course is pursued by churches, and communities of churches, respecting their communion with each other.

The various denominations, assuming for themselves respectively, that they hold the true faith, consider themselves bound to reject those whom they believe to be in an important error; and the test of their rejecting them is, in withholding or refusing a common participation at the Lord's table. Upon the ground of these differences, the various sects or denominations of Christians are founded. Secessions from churches take place only when differences arise of such magnitude as to prevent a mutual participation in the communion; and while these differences remain, it is useless to look for the removal of such restrictions.

It is contended by those holding what is termed free communion, that a church assumes unauthorized power in refusing to communicate with such persons and churches as differ from them in the doctrines and duties of Christianity. But, as unsocial as this is, and so censorious as it may seem to be, I see not how it is to be avoided while these differences exist. All error leading to practical results, must be looked upon as a departure from the instructions of Christ and his Apostles; therefore, the church is bound to protest against it. The church is recognized in the Scriptures as a divinely organized body, furnished with all suitable and necessary laws and regulations. Now it will be admitted, that differences do arise between the church and her members, in which the latter are believed to have departed from their Christian duties. The church is bound, in such cases, to labor to reclaim them. In many cases of this nature, the voice of the church is disregarded. In reference to such cases, our Lord has said, "If he neglect to hear the church, let him be to thee as an heathen man, and a publican." Matt. 18: 17. The church is not at liberty to neglect giving counsel to her erring members, and if they disregard her voice, she must either disobey Christ, and thus cease to be his church, or she must obey him, and place her refractory members among the men of the world; and thus put an end to their religious connection.

Again, St. Paul, in 2 Thess. 3: 6, says: "Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which he received of us." To walk disorderly, is here defined by the Apostle to be a departure from the tradition, that is, the custom, doctrine, or law, either written or unwritten, which he had delivered to them. Or, as the Apostle himself explains it in chap. 2: 15: "Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word, or our epistle." Whoever, therefore, departs from the doctrine or ordinances of Christ, as they are taught in the Scriptures, violates Gospel order, and is in the Apostle's sense of the phrase, a disorderly walker; and from such, the church is commanded to withdraw. The word stello, translated to withdraw, is rendered by Parkurst to avoid, to shun, to withdraw. Greenfield renders the word, to bring one's self to a stand, to draw back, withdraw one's self from, depart from, avoid, shun. We believe this necessarily comprehends a refusal to commune with such as violate a Gospel order and discipline.

The same Apostle says, Eph. 5: 11, "And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them." What works are more worthy of the character of unfruitful works of darkness, than those whose origin may be traced to the darkness of the apostate church of Rome? And would it be reproving these works, to commune at the Lord's table with the abettors and advocates of them? Certainly not. This would be understood as fellowshiping them in the most direct manner. We are commanded rather to reprove them; not the works merely, but those who do them.

St. John directs us not to receive any who come to us, and bring not the doctrine of Christ, and adds, "For he that biddeth him God speed, is partaker of his evil deeds." 2 John v. 11. Again—the Apostle to the Romans, chapter 16: 17, says, "Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences, contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned, and avoid them." The word ekklino signifies to avoid, shun, run away from, fly from, and shows in the clearest manner, that we should hold no religious connection with such as are contentious, sow discord among brethren, and cause divisions in the church, contrary to the doctrine of Christ.

That withdrawing from erring brethren consists in refusing to eat the Lord's Supper with them, is, I think, clearly indicated in 1 Cor. 5: 11, where St. Paul forbids his brethren eating with any one, although he is called a brother, if he be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolator, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner. Giving this passage its most limited construction, it certainly forbids eating the Lord's Supper with such as offend in any of the vices here mentioned; and refusing to eat with such is the strongest evidence they could give that they were not partakers with them in those sins.

From the foregoing remarks, it is evident, that although it is the duty of a man to examine himself before he eats of the Lord's Supper, it is nevertheless his duty to know something about the faith and character of those with whom he eats it. For by this communicative act, he does, in the most unequivocal manner, bid them God speed. It is well known, that Christian denominations differ widely from each other respecting the importance of certain sentiments and ordinances. Thus, for example, our Pedobaptist brethren consider immersion in baptism quite unimportant; whereas, in the opinion of Baptists, it is the very essence of baptism—a sine qua non to the ordinance. Hence the former may freely commune with the latter without doing violence to their understanding of the forecited instructions; but the latter cannot, upon the same easy terms, commune with the former. Again, our brethren who observe the first day of the week, concede that keeping the seventh day is in accordance with the fourth precept of the Decalogue, and that it does not conflict with any precept of the New Testament; and they can, therefore, commune with such as keep it, without infringing, on their part, with the Scripture rule of communion. But the Sabbath-keeper cannot reciprocate, in this matter, because, in his estimation, keeping holy the seventh day is as essential to keeping the Sabbath, as immersion is to baptism. To commune with brethren, knowing that they live in the practice of these errors, would be becoming the abettors and partakers of these evil things.

It appears to me, then, that restricted communion is the necessary consequence of the differences in sentiment and practice, which exist among Christians; and is chargeable upon those who have left the Scriptures as their sole guide in religious things, and have substituted in their place the doctrines and traditions of men. And I see not how the removal of all restrictions from this ordinance, could at all affect the evils of division in the church, so long as those differences exist. The divisions would still be the same. Each sect would still adhere to its denominational standard. Nor does it appear that those churches which are the most liberal in their invitations to the Lord's table, are more liberal towards each other in their ordinary intercourse, than those which are the most restricted. So that there appears not to be any thing gained on the score of brotherly kindness, by extending the communion beyond denominational limits, as a compensation for the loss of consistency and a Gospel discipline.

But it is a point worthy of serious investigation, whether these restrictions upon communion are not, in some cases, applied without proper and sufficient cause. It seems to me, that all who give satisfactory evidence of a renewed heart, and embrace substantially the doctrines of the Gospel, (waiving all technicalities on these points,) who obey the precepts of the Decalogue, and the ordinances of the Gospel as enjoined in the New Testament, might with strict propriety, and ought to, be united in one communion. If among such Christians, a difference of opinion is entertained respecting church discipline, forms of worship, or other things not expressly defined in the Scriptures, they might well bear with each other in such matters. And if separate communities are organized on these grounds, they should not be, in my opinion, subjected to the rules of restricted communion, but freely received as members of the same ecclesiastical body.

W. B. M.

I confess, (said a faithful servant of God,) that I seldom hear the bell toll for one that is dead, but conscience asks me, what hast thou done for the saving of that soul before it left the body? There is one more gone into eternity, what didst thou do to prepare him for it? and what testimony must he give to the Judge concerning thee? [Baxter.

RESTORATION OF THE JEWS.

Mr. M. M. Noah, who may be regarded as one of the fathers and teachers of the Jewish people, recently delivered a lecture in New York, on the Restoration of the Jews. The subject is one of gradually increasing importance, and this lecture, which is really a plea of the Jews uttered through one of their own number, will be read with interest. The exercises of the occasion commenced with the following beautiful and appropriate hymn:—

"Jerusalem! my glorious home!
Name ever dear to me!
When shall my labors have an end,
In joy and peace, in thee?
Oh! when, thou city of my God,
Shall I thy courts ascend.
Where congregations ne'er break up,
And Sabbaths have no end?

"There happier bowers than Eden's bloom,
Nor sin nor sorrow know;
Bless'd seats! through rude and stormy scenes,
I onward press to you!
Why should I shrink at pain and wo,
Or feel at death dismay!
I've Canaan's goodly land in view,
And realms of endless day."

Mr. Noah introduced his lecture by stating, that he had long been anxious to appear before his fellow citizens in behalf of a venerable people, whose history and sufferings had filled the world with awe and astonishment, to ask that justice should be done to their motives and character, and every possible aid extended to them in accomplishing their destiny, and restoring them to the lands of their forefathers. He asked, where could their cause be better presented, and the work of regeneration be better commenced, than in the cradle of American liberty, where the condition of the Greek, the African, and the Indian, had received so much sympathy. He then took a brief view of the history of the Jews from the time of Abraham down to the capture of Jerusalem by Pompey; and spoke at length of the birth of our Saviour, and the extraordinary events occurring at that period.

As there will be peculiar interest felt in Mr. Noah's views of the advent and crucifixion of Christ, we give the following full account of them from the report of one of the daily papers:

To comprehend and fully understand the peculiar situation in which the Jewish people were placed at that important crisis, we must endeavor, if possible, to place ourselves in their position. A nation once powerful, rich and happy, prosperous and independent, the conquerors of every neighboring power, living in the midst of luxury and civilization, enjoying a happy and an equitable code of laws, with wise kings, gallant warriors, a pious priesthood, and a great national prosperity, suddenly assailed by powerful Pagan nations, allured by a love of gold, and tempted by the hope of plunder, contending year after year against fearful odds; their enemy strengthened by fresh levies, while their own resources were exhausted; finding themselves at length gradually sinking, a weak, decayed, defeated power; the once glorious and famed people, abandoned by hope, and almost deserted by Providence, their Temple, their pride and glory, wrested from them, and the beams of the setting sun, falling upon the helmet of the Roman centurion, keeping guard near the Holy of Holies!

In this distracted position, and at this period of unexampled calamity, Jesus of Nazareth found the Jews at the commencement of his ministry.

Corruptions, the natural consequence of great misfortune, had crept in amongst them; a portion of the priesthood forgot the obligation due to their high order; hypocrisy and intrigue, had reached the high places, and Jesus appeared amongst them the most resolute of reformers. Denouncing the Priests and Pharisees, preaching against hypocrisy and vice, prophesying the downfall of the nation, and thus attracting followers and apostles by his extraordinary and gifted powers, he became formidable by his decison of character, his unceremonious expression of opinion, and the withering nature of his rebuke; he preached at all times and at all places, in and out of the temple, with an eloquence such as no mortal has since possessed; and to give the most powerful and absorbing interest to his mission, he proclaimed himself the Son of God, and declared himself ordained by the Most High, to save a benighted and suffering people as their Saviour and Redeemer. The Jews were amazed, perplexed and bewildered at all they saw and heard. They knew Jesus from his birth: he was their neighbor; they knew his father Joseph, and Mary his mother, his brothers, James and Judas; he was in constant intercourse with his brethren in their domestic relations, and surrounded by their household gods; they remembered him a boy, disputing, as was the custom, most learnedly with the doctors in the Temple; as a man pursuing to the age of thirty, the modest and laborous calling of his profession; and yet he proclaimed himself the Son of God, and performed most wonderful miracles, was surrounded by a number of disciples, poor, but extraordinary gifted men, who sustained his doctrines, and had an abiding faith in his mission; he gathered strength and followers as he progressed; he denounced the whole nation, and propheised its destruction, with their altars and temples; he preached against whole cities and proscribed their leaders with a force, which even at this day would shake our social systems. The Jews became alarmed at his increasing power and influence, and the Sanhedrim resolved to become his accuser, and bring him to trial under the law as laid down in the 13th of Deuteronomy.

In reflecting deeply on all the circumstances of this the most remarkable trial and judgement in history, I am convinced from the whole tenor of the proceedings, that the arrest, trial, and condemnation of Jesus of Nazareth, was conceived and executed under a decided panic. That he proclaimed himself Son of God, that he declared he had been delegated from the Father to enter upon his mediatorial character, that he was a prophet and the promised Messiah, was understood and admitted by all his friends and disciples; but still it has appeared to me throughout that there was not sufficient testimony to come under the special and distinct provisions of the law. The parables and figures of the Hebrew language, and the oriental mode of expression, frequently cloud and embarras the real meaning intended to be conveyed. Jesus uniformly acknowledged the unity and omnipotence of God. To him he prayed as our Father in Heaven, whose name was hallowed, whose will was to be executed on earth; he disclaimed any intention to alter the Mosaic law, but confirmed and observed every part of it. It was not therefore altogether on the charge of Jesus having called himself the Son of God, that the Sanhedrim accused and condemned him; political considerations mingled themselves, and in a measure controlled the decision of the Council, and this is demonstrable from the declaration of Caiphas himself, as stated in the Gospel—"Better that one man should die than the nation should be destroyed."

It was the sedition, and not altogether the blasphemy, the terror and apprehension of political overthrow, which led to conviction; and this political and national characteristic was maintained throughout; it was that consideration which induced the Jews to urge upon Pilate a confirmation of the sentence. It was the charge of assuming the prerogatives of Cæsar, not the name of the Divinity, which overcame the well-founded objections of the Roman Governor; and crucifixion itself was a Roman, and not a Jewish punishment. The opprobrious insults heaped upon the master, came from Roman soldiers, and that mixed rabble, which even in our day desecrate all that is held sacred.

It is not my duty to condemn the course of our ancestors, nor yet to justify the measures they adopted in that dire extremity; but if there are mitigating circumstances, I am bound by the highest considerations which a love of truth and justice dictates, to spread them before you, at the same time, to protest against any entailing upon us the responsibility of acts committed eighteen hundred years ago by our fathers, and thus transmitting to untold generations the anger and hatred of a faith erroneously taught to believe us the aggressors.

—But the death of Jesus was the birth of Christianity; the Gentile Church sprang from the ruins which surrounded its primitive existence; its march was onward, beset with darkness and difficulties, with oppression and persecution, until the Sun of the Reformation rose upon it, dissipating the clouds of darkness which had obscured its beginning, and it shone forth with a liberal and tolerant brightness, such as the Great Master had originally designed it. Had not that event occurred, how would you have been saved from your sins? The Jews in this did nothing but what God himself ordained, for you will find it written in the Acts of the Apostles—"And now brethren, I know that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers!"

While the Almighty raised up, enlarged and extended the Gentile Church, gave it power and dominion, he threw the mantle of his divine protection over his chosen people, and has preserved them, amidst unheard of danger to this very day, numerous as they have ever been, but still distinct as a nation, preserving the Abrahamic Covenant, walking in his statutes, and obeying his commandments; the same people whom he had brought out of Egyptian bondage, and to whom he had given the land of Israel as an inheritance forever, and who is now leading us back in peace and happiness to repossess our ancient and promised land.

* * * *

The following will exhibit pretty clearly Mr. Noah's views of the prospects and means of restoration:

Within the last twenty-five years, great revolutions have occurred in the East, affecting, in a peculiar manner, the future destiny of the followers of Mahomet, and distinctly marking the gradual advancement of the Christian power. Turkey has been deprived of Greece, after a fearful and sanguinary struggle, and the land of warriors and sages has become sovereign and independent. Egypt conquered and occupied Syria, and the fierce Pacha had thrown off allegiance to the Sultan. Menaced, however, by the superior power of the Ottoman Porte, Mehemet Ali was compelled to submit to the Commander of the Faithful, reconveying Syria to Turkey, and was contented to accept the hereditary possession of Egypt. Russia has assailed the wandering hordes of the Caucasus. England has had various contests with the native princes of India, and has waged war with China. The issue of these contests in Asia has been marked with singular success, and evidently indicate the progressive power of the Christian governments in that interesting quarter of the globe. France has carried its victorious arms through the north of Africa. Russia, with a steady glance and firm step, approached Turkey in Europe; and when her railroads are completed to the Red Sea, will pour in her Cossacks from the Don and the Vistula, and Constantinople will be occupied by the descendants of the Tartar Dynasty, and all Turkey in Europe, united to Greece, will constitute either an independent empire, or be occupied by Russia, who with one arm on the Mediterranean, and the other on the North Sea, will nearly embrace all Europe. The counterbalance of the gigantic power will be a firm and liberal union of Austria with all Italy and the Roman States down to the borders of Gaul—but the revolution will not end here. England must possess Egypt, will affording the only secure route to her possessions in India through the Red Sea. Then Palestine, thus placed between the Russian possessions and Egypt, will revert to its legitimate proprietors, and for the safety of surrounding nations, a powerful, wealthy, independent, and enterprising people, are placed there, by and with the consent of the Christian powers; and with their aid and agency, the land of Isreal passes once more into the possession of the descendants of Abraham. The ports of the Mediterranean will be again opened to the busy hum of commerce, the fields will again bear the fruitful harvest, and the Christian and the Jew will, together on Mount Zion, raise their voices in praise of him, whose covenant with Abraham was to endure for ever, and in whose seed all the nations of the earth are to be blessed.

This is our destiny. Every attempt to colonize the Jews in other countries has failed—their eye has steadily rested on their beloved Jerusalem, and they have said, "the time will come, the promise will be fulfilled!"

The Jews are in a most favorable position to repossess themselves of the Promised Land, and organize a free and liberal government. In Poland, Maldavia, Wallachia; on the Rhine and Daunbe, and wherever the liberality of the governments have not interposed obstacles, they are practical farmers. Agriculture was once their only natural employment. The land is now desolate, according to the perdiction of the prophets, but it is full of hope and promise. The soil is rich, loamy, and every where indicates fruitfulness; and the magnificient cedars of Lebanon show the strength of the soil on the highest elevations. The climate is mild and salubrious, and double crops in the lowlands may be annually anticipated. Every thing is produced in the greatest variety; wheat, barley, rye, corn, oats, and the cotton plant in great abundance. The sugar cane is cultivated with success; Tobacco grows plentifully on the mountains, Indigo is produced in abundance on the banks of the Jordan; Olives and Olive Oil are every where found; the Mulberry almost grows wild, out of which the most beautiful silk is made; Grapes of the largest kind flourish every where; Cochmeal is produced in abundance on the coast, and can be most profitably cultivated; the Coffee tree grows almost spontaneously, and Oranges, Figs, Dates, Pomegranates, Peaches, Apples, Plums, Nectarines, Pine Apples, and all the tropical fruits known to us, flourish every where about Syria. The several ports in the Mediterranean, which formerly carried on a most valuable commerce, can be advantageously re-occupied. Manufactures of wool, cotton and silk could furnish all the Levant and the Islands of the Mediterranean with useful fabrics. In a circumference within twenty days travel of the Holy City, two millions of Jews reside. Of the two and a half tribes which removed East of the trans-Jordanic cities, Judah and Benjamin and half Manassah, I compute the number in every part of the world as exceeding six millions. Of the missing nine and a half tribes, part of which are in Turkey, China, Hindostan, Persia, and on this continent, it is impossible to ascertain their numerical force. Many only retain the strict observance of the Mosaic laws, rejecting the Talmud and Commentaries; others in Syria, Egypt and Turkey, are rigid observers of the ceremonies.

Reforms are in progress which correspond with the enlightened character of the age, without invading any of the cardinal principles of religion. The whole sect are therefore in a position, as far as intelligence, education, industry, undivided enterprise, variety of pursuits, science and love of the arts, political economy and wealth, could desire, to adopt the initiatory steps for the organization of a free government in Syria, as I have before said, by and with the consent and under the protection of the Christian powers.

I propose, therefore, for all the Christian Societies who take an interest in the fate of Isreal, to assist in their restoration, by aiding to colonize the Jews in Judea; the progress may be slow, but the result will be certain. The tree must be planted, and it will not want liberal and pious hands to water it, and in time it may flourish and produce fruit of hope and blessing.

The first step is to solicit from the Sultan of Turkey permission for the Jews to purchase and hold land, to build houses, and to follow any occupation they may desire. The moment the Sultan issues his Hatte Scherif, allowing the Jews to purchase and hold land in Syria, subject to the same laws and limitations which govern Mussulmen, the whole territory surrounding Jerusalem, including the villages of Hebron, Lafat, Tyre, also Beyroot, Jaffa, and other ports of the Mediterranean, will be occupied by enterprising Jews. The valleys of the Jordan will be filled by agriculturalists from the north of Germany, Poland, and Russia. Merchants will occupy the seaports, and the commanding positions within the walls of Jerusalem will be purchased by the wealthy and pious of our brethren. Those who desire to reside in the Holy Land, and have not means, may be aided by these Societies to reach their destined haven of repose.

Christians can thus give impetus to this important movement, and emigrants flowing in, and actively engaged in every laudable pursuit, will soon become consolidated, and lay the foundation for the elements of Government and the triumph of Restoration.

Beautiful is the love of a sister; the kiss that hath no guile, and no passion; the touch is purity, and bringeth peace, satisfaction to the heart, and no fever to the pulse. Beautiful is the love of a sister; it is moonlight on our path—it has light, but not heat; it is of heaven, and sheds its peace upon the earth.

"The Bite" that could not Hurt.—A gentleman was complaining to a pious prelate, that a certain clergyman in his neighborhood was gone mad, for that he did nothing but preach and pray; 'I wish then,' said the good Bishop, 'he would bite some of my clergy!'

The Sabbath Recorder.

NEW YORK, NOV. 7, 1844.

FALSE EXPOSITION—ITS CONSEQUENCES.

The Fourth Commandment has been variously expounded by its professed friends. Among these expositions, none has been more injurious than that which represents it as requiring the observance, not of the Sabbath, and the seventh day, but of a Sabbath, and a seventh day—not of a certain and well-known time, but of an uncertain and varying time. Yet this is the exposition of it which is given both by commentators and writers on the subject of the Sabbath. It will be found, however, that this view is generally presented in order to prepare the way to introduce the first day of the week, under the specious name of Lord's day, into the place of the Sabbath. Thus some are made to think, that the name Sabbath may as well be applied to the first day of the week as to the seventh. But to such an exposition there are several serious objections:—

1. It is a perversion of the original text itself. In every place where the weekly Sabbath and the seventh day are spoken of, the Hebrew article is uniformly used. This article is often used like our demonstrative, this, but more commonly like our definite article, the—never as our indefinite ar[illegible] and Gesenius, in answer to the question whether it may be used indefinitely, says, "the definite article can not be rightly said to stand indefinitely." To this opinion agree all our translators, both ancient and modern, who have rendered the terms, both in the fourth commandment and all other places of the Scripture, by the Sabbath and the seventh day.

2. It makes the Fourth Commandment to be indefinite and absurd. If that commandment only requires the observance of a Sabbath, or rest, and that on a seventh day, then one man might keep the seventh day, another the third day, and another the fifth day, yet all obey the commandment. What confusion would thus result from carrying out this exposition to its legitimate results! But God's commandment is not yea an nay after this manner. It says, "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." That man will not be held guiltless, who misinterprets and misrepresents it, for however pious a purpose he may do so.

3. It is contrary to the teachings of the very men who give this exposition; for they affirm, that the fourth commandment required the keeping of the seventh day until Christ came. Now, if the Jews before Christ were bound to keep a certain and definite day, and that the seventh day, then the commandment required a certain and definite day, and that the seventh day.

From these considerations it is evident, that those who represent the fourth commandment as requiring the observance of only a Sabbath, and that upon some one day of the seven indefinitely, are guilty of a false exposition of the commandment, and of handling the word of God deceitfully. They make a plain passage of Scripture to signify one thing for some thousands of years, and then ever afterwards to signify another thing. Thus do they make void the commandment of God, that they may keep their own traditions.

—Now let us turn to a consideration of some of the consequences of this kind of exposition. Among these we will mention only three.

1. It overturns all certainty in explaining the Scriptures. If a man, in translating from a Latin or Greek author, should pervert his author's meaning in this manner, by using words in a different sense from that in which they were intended, he would be cast out and despised. But yet when a preacher represents the term the Sabbath as meaning simply a rest, that so he may call the first day of the week a rest, and therefore the Sabbath, he deals worse with the Scriptures than the translator just mentioned does with his profane author. Instead, however, of being cast out and despised, his speculations are allowed to go for truth. Thus unbelievers are encouraged in their infidelity; and occasion is given for them to say, that the Bible is interpreted by its friends to mean just what they please to have it. It is dangerous for men to use their wits thus to blind the eyes of their fellows.

2. It abolishes the Lord's Sabbath, and makes the Fourth Commandment to be a mere cipher. First, it abolishes the Lord's Sabbath, because it teaches that the observance of the seventh day, on which God rested, and which he introduced into the commandment as one with the Sabbath, is not at all binding, but the day may be spent in any kind of labor. Is not this to abolish the Lord's Sabbath? —Second, it makes the fourth commandment a cipher, because it takes away the time, which is the seventh day, and the event commemorated, which is God's resting from his creative work. Now read the commandment, as these expounders would have it, bereft of the time and the event commemorated. It then commands only a rest, without any precept or example as to its length or frequency. One person, therefore, may rest one hour in each day; another one day in a month; and a third one month in a year, and each may call this keeping the Sabbath. Does not this make the fourth commandment a mere cipher?

3. It abuses God's Word, and misleads his people. It abuses his Word, by representing that the Word teaches what it does not teach, and that it fails to teach what it attempts to teach. It misleads his people, on one side, by pressing the fourth commandment to sustain the first day of the week, which it says nothing about, thus laying a yoke upon the people, requiring them to observe a day in regard to which they will finally be asked, Who hath required this at your hands? On the other side, it misleads the people, by encouraging them to neglect a day which God hath sanctified and commanded them to keep holy.

Such are some of the consequences of this false exposition of the fourth commandment. They affect both the sabbatic institution itself, and those whose duty it is to remember it. It is true, that the persons who countenance such expositions are called very zealous and godly men; but this, instead of bettering the case, makes it worse. If they were enemies to the commandment, such things might be expected, and would be comparatively unimportant; but that the wound should be inflicted by its friends, aggravates the evil. There is occasion to tremble for some religious teachers, who profess great interest in the Sabbath, but who yet refuse to hear the truth in regard to it. Some such there are, who, if the truth be presented to them, instead of inquiring if these things are so, imitate the Jews of old, who, when they were cut to the heart, gnashed on their reprover with their teeth; and when they could endure it no longer, "stopped their ears, and ran upon him with one accord." Such would do well to inquire, if they are not in this thing teaching error for truth, and their own traditions for the commandments of God.

WITHOUT THE BIBLE.

We have been surprised, in looking over the reports of some of the American Tract Society's Colporteurs, to notice how large number of persons, in some favored parts of our country, are destitute of the Scriptures. One colporteur spent ten weeks in northern Pennsylvania, where he visited 1466 families, 204 of which were destitute of the Bible, and 438 had no religious books except the Bible. Another visited 889 families in Carbon Co. Penn., and found 232 families, or more than one-fourth, destitute of the Bible.

In New Jersey, a colporteur visited Atlantic County, having a population of 8,700, of whom nearly one-half of those over five years of age could not read so as to profit much by books. Two other colporteurs explored the mountainous parts of Sussex County, where they found 556 families, out of 2133, destitute of all religious books except the Bible, and 260 families had not even the word of God. The religious condition of the laborers in the furnaces, mines, and collieries, was extremely wretched, and the people appeared like sheep without a shepherd. Some persons were found to whom the plainest truths of the Gospel were new—they being unable to give any intelligible account whatever of the history of Jesus Christ.

Such is the state of things existing in sections of our country which are esteemed enlightened. It should check the spirit of exultation which is so often manifested, and lead to the prayer, that the Lord would send forth his light and his truth.

THE GALLERY OF FINE ARTS.

For the Recorder.

The Gallery of Fine Arts is the name of a new institution just commenced in this city, which must be hailed with joy, not only by citizens, but by all Americans who have regretted the want of a national collection of paintings—something that shall represent the genius and taste of American artists—something permanent, that will afford us "pictures of fair and spiritual beauty, forms of majestic virtue, portraitures of heroism and patriotism, to lift the thoughts above their wonted range, to nobleness and sanctity—soft and dreamy landscapes, to draw away the mind from cankering care and the choaking dust of the street, and carry it back to scenes of childhood and innocence."

Visiting the Hall a few evenings since for the first time, my attention was arrested by a series of five large pictures by Cole, representing the "Course of Empire"—a nation's origin, progress, greatness, decline, and fall, and the consequent changes of the same landscape.

The first represents the savage state. It is a wild and rugged landscape. The half-clad natives are pursuing their prey among the rocks, or holding a carnival about their camp fires. The antelope flies with an arrow quivering in his breast, or with hounds close upon his track. The lake is agitated with the storm, just breaking away before the rising sun. It is the dawn of a nation's existence.

The next picture carries us forward through the lapse of centuries. The same hills appear in the back-ground, but all is calm and beautiful. Flocks are feeding in soft meadows, and the shepherd reclines in the shade, or marks with his staff rude diagrams in the sand, or upon a flowery turf sings his unwritten melody. The bay reflects from its glassy surface the fleecy clouds and the tall forest trees that line its margin. In the distance is the smoke of sacrifice ascending from a rude temple. Religion, the arts and sciences, are in their infancy. It is the pastoral age.

The scene changes—it is the "Consummation of Empire." A gorgeous city, with its temples and arches, pillars and palaces bursts upon the sight. Every where are seen throngs of an exulting populace. Gallies with armed men, or loaded with merchandize, spread their silken sails upon the water. Science has reached the acme of its glory. The whole scene is clothed with magnificence. The canvass seems to move with life and animation. The sun, which in the first of the series was just rising, is now at the meridian. Wealth brings with it vice and corruption, and pride is working its own fall.

Ages pass—and grim-visaged war has come to scourge them. Swarms of a less effeminate race are rushing with sword and flames to desolate the imperial city. No one of the series, perhaps, exhibits so well the genius of the artist as this. He has pictured the horrors of war with a vividness that startles, and we feel an instinctive impulse to snatch some poor wretch from the destruction that awaits him. Feeling that we cannot save the city which is already in flames, or stanch the blood of a single wound, we turn our eyes to another age.

War has done its work; time has filled up the scene; and the "Course of Empire" is completed. The Sun of the nation has set, and the Moon shines calm and clear upon a ruin. The desolation is as perfect as if the race of man had perished with the work of his hands. A slimy pool has filled the place of his palace, and the heron, in solemn mockery, has built its nest upon the crumbling ruins.

I amused myself for some time in tracing the changing countenances of some of the spectators as they passed through the series, and here they always paused, as one does over the grave of an early friend, in silence and sadness. I returned home feeling somewhat as though I had outlived my generation.

The gallery is intended to be a national thing; and the payment of one dollar entitles you to membership and free admission for life. Who that intends to visit New York four times in his life, would not be a member?

YEARLY MEETING OF THE NEW JERSEY CHURCHES.

[Communicated.]

The Sabbath-keeping Churches of New Jersey held their Yearly Meeting, in Shiloh, Cumberland Co., which commenced on the 17th day of last month, and continued for four days. Brethren N. V. Hull, W. B. Gillett, and S. Davison were the preachers. Bro. Hull continued to preach every evening during the following week. The meeting was one of much interest, not for any blazing excitement which was attempted or produced, but for the fraternal and pious affections that were awakened, and the sober, serious regard for the cause of God and souls which the brethren evinced in preaching and in hearing—in their deportment, their prayers, and their alms. During the meeting, the claims of the American Sabbath Tract Society were considered and entertained with an interest that appeared to be deep, and promised to be permanent and effective. The Female Mite Society voted ten dollars of its funds for the object; an annual subscription to the amount of thirty-two dollars was obtained; and the church resolved itself into an auxiliary of the parent Society, with a resolution to take monthly Sabbath collections for the object. The preaching, which was of a thoroughly Scriptural character, was evidently blessed to the strengthening of the saints in the most holy faith, and the awakening of some, who have heretofore been careless, to serious concern for the salvation of their souls.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

The late intelligence from the Missions in Burmah, under the direction of the American Baptist Board, is of an encouraging character. The schools are in a prosperous state, and are in several instances unusually large and interesting. The reports from the churches are gratifying. The number of additions by baptism reported by the last arrival, was one hundred and fifty-one. Among these additions, some persons of considerable influence are mentioned.

From Greece the report is, that three young soldiers have been baptized, and it is hoped that others have been born again.

Among the Indians considerable interest has been manifested. A meeting was held at Shawanoe, at which six persons were received into the church. Some encouraging facts are stated concerning the progress of religion among the Creeks.

THE ARMENIANS.

The Missionary Herald for November, contains a letter signed by "all the evangelical brethren of the Armenian nation," expressing their gratitude for the labor bestowed upon their people, and their confidence that it will be crowned with happy results. They speak particularly of their satisfaction in having the whole Bible to read in a language understood by all, and also in having an abridged History of the Reformation. It is their belief, "that our kind heavenly Father, who has so far enlightened the nation, will in a short space of time greatly extend the work; and that many of the wealthy among the people will without hesitation devote their wealth to spreading the kingdom of Christ."

Query.—We are indebted to the Christian Index for the following resolution of the Georgia Association;

"Resolved, That this Association recommend to the churches a more Scriptural observance of the Lord's day, and to our ministering brethren, to enforce upon their churches, by a sermon adapted to the object, the necessity of such observance."

By the term "Lord's day," we suppose the first day of the week is here meant. If so, we should like to inquire, what would be a Scriptural observance of it? We are not aware that the Scriptures say any thing about the manner of observing it. And we are sure that the church, for many centuries, taught that it might be used for feasting and dancing. Perhaps the Index can give us some light.

N. Y. Baptist State Convention.—This Convention held a session in Rochester recently, at which 200 delegates were present. During the past year 250 persons have been baptized, 4 churches constituted, 7 chapels built, and 7 others are in progress. The Board have missionary stations among the Tonawanda and Tuscarora Indians, both of which are said to be in a prosperous condition. Since its organization, the convention has assisted in building up 129 churches, which now contain over 17,000 members. Considerable effort has been made to increase the subscription list of the Baptist Register, which has been partially successful.

Mr. O. A. Brownson, editor of the Boston Quarterly, a gentleman who has been celebrated for his opposition to all church organizations, was recently received into the Roman Catholic Church.

Papacy Bankrupt.—It is asserted that the Papal Government is at the present time sixty-seven millions of dollars in debt, and that this debt is increasing at the rate of a million of dollars a year. Much of the church property is under mortgages, and it is difficult for the Government to effect a loan. The latest accounts represent Rome as being in an unsettled state—the people presenting their claims, and the Pontiff refusing to make any concessions to them. Among business men, this condition of things would be regarded as rather omenous.

Honor to Massachusetts.—In Massachusetts it is left to the people of each county to decide by vote whether the sale of liquor shall be tolerated within the county. With one inglorious exception, every county has refused to grant licenses. But some persons having undertaken to carry on the traffic in defiance of the law, the offenders have been arrested, convicted, and severely fined. This is making right laws, and then living up to them.

New Religious Paper.—The Presbyterian Synod of New York and New Jersey, has had under discussion the subject of establishing a paper in New York, to propagate and defend the principles of order contained in the standards of that church. After canvassing pretty freely the merits of the papers now established, it was deemed best to have another, and a committee was appointed to act in the matter.

Christian Review.—We are sorry to learn from the Baptist papers, that their quarterly periodical, the Christian Review, is in a languishing condition, and must cease to be published at the close of the year, unless its subscription list is increased.

Sailing of Missionaries.—Rev. E. B. Cross and wife, missionaries of the American Baptist Board of Foreign Missions, sailed on Wednesday the 30th ultimo, in the ship Arno, for Maulmain. They are destined to the Tavoy mission. Mr. C. is from Brooklyn, N. Y. Mrs. C. is a daughter of Rev. Benjamin Putnam, formerly of Randolph, and afterwards Springfield, Massachusetts.

As we Expected.—The late refusal of the Board of the Baptist Home Mission Society to appoint a slaveholding missionary, meets with the unqualified disapprobation of the Southern portion of that church. The "Christian Index," the organ of the Georgia Convention, contains an article, denouncing the decision as unjust, and based upon a false assumption. It is regarded as making a distinction between the slaveholder and the non-slaveholder. The editor of the Index says, "If, while they (the Board) refuse to appoint slaveholders to office, they continue to appoint anti-slavery men, we have just cause of complaint, and complain we will. We will not cease to protest against their partiality."

The Slave Question.—The Synod of Cincinnati, at its recent session, adopted Resolutions explanatory of its views on the subject of Slavery, being prompted thereto by misunderstandings on the subject still prevalent in some of the Churches. The Resolutions declare Slavery, as existing in the United States, to be manifestly contrary to the principles of the Gospel, and therefore sinful; but there are, in the opinion of the Synod, individuals in the Church standing in the relation of master and slave, under such peculiar circumstances, that they cannot be justly charged with sin merely because of that relation.

Charges against a Bishop.—Charges of a serious nature have been preferred against Rev. Bishop Onderdonk, of New York, a brother of the late Bishop of Pennsylvania. The facts have been laid before three Bishops, through whom the subject must be brought up, if at all. Meanwhile the Bishop has published a letter, expressing his confidence that all prejudicial reports are groundless, and requesting that judgment may be suspended for the present.

The Bible in Schools.—Since the report of Mr. Reese, County Superintendent, showing that the Bible had been excluded from the schools of some Wards in New York, that officer has succeeded in introducing the Holy Scriptures, without note or comment, into seven schools from from which it had been excluded. This was not done without much opposition. It is hoped, however, that the Book of books will soon be introduced into all the schools of the four other Wards charged with its exclusion.

Texas.—Much has been said about the views of Dr. Jones, the new President elect of Texas, in regard to annexation. The following extract of a letter from him settles the question:

"I am not yet without hopes of annexation; and as I have had a great deal to do in this matter, I have some pride in wishing to go through with it. The charge that I am 'inimical to further negociations with the United States for the re-annexation of our country to that,' is wholly without foundation in fact, and a base slander."

Snow Storm.—The western part of New York was visited by a heavy snow storm last week. At Rochester, it commenced on Sunday evening, and continued until Wednesday morning. About two feet of snow fell. The consequence was, that in several cases the trains of cars were either impeded or entirely stopped, and the mails sent forward by sleighs. The roofs of two or three buildings in Rochester gave way from the accumulation of snow upon them.

The amount received by the Treasurer of the Baptist Board of Missions for September, is $7811,64; corresponding month last year, $2296,05.

THE SECOND ADVENT.

Since the tenth day of the seventh month has past, the excitement about the immediate second advent seems to have almost subsided. The Advent Herald of Boston, and the Midnight Cry of New York, have each issued another number, in which a subdued and chastened spirit is manifested. They profess to have no other plan for the future, except to follow the leadings of Providence. The last number of the Cry says, "The Word stands sure, however we may err; and the promise is true, 'If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God.' The Lord will lead his obedient children." We are glad to hear these expressions of confidence in "the Word," and to know that the editor's mind is directed to the spirit of obedience as that which alone promises safety. Would it not be well in the midst of the present disappointments, to inquire, whether that spirit has been carried out in all things?

A GOOD EXAMPLE.

The way our Methodist Brethren support their Papers.—The Richmond Christian Advocate, in speaking of one of his brethren, makes the following remarks. We commend the example to our brethren.

"We do not refer to his late letter containing thirty-eight new subscribers, but to one just received, containing TWENTY-TWO—making SIXTY in two weeks. Many have done well; but he does better than all. But how does he get so many subscribers? Hear him. 'I have just closed a meeting at New Prospect, where upwards of forty were converted. I cannot be satisfied until the converts have our paper, and I make it a matter of conscience to advise them to take it. I have sent you seventy already, and in procuring them I believe I have done more good than in preaching half-a-dozen sermons.'" [Exchange paper.

"Campaign Papers"—A Suggestion.—At the time our paper was started, its friends found an obstacle to increasing its subscribers, in the numerous campaign papers which flooded the country. Those papers close their career with the present week; and we hope the occasion will not be lost to make an effort for increasing our circulation. Now is the time, friends, when a little effort on your part may do us much good. Will you try?

The Past Week has been one of uncommon interest among the politicians of New York. When our last paper went to press, on Wednesday, the Whigs were marching through different parts of the city in procession, with a profuse display of banners, and a full representation of the different trades. On Friday night the Democratic party had a torch-light procession, which paraded the streets until a late hour. The Native Americans, not to be outdone by either of the other parties, had fixed upon Monday last for an overwhelming demonstration; but the severe storm prevented their appearance. Tuesday of this week was the day of election, and of course a day of excitement and confusion. We are now past the eventful period, however, and may hope in future to hear some other music than political songs, and some other news than election returns.

Election Returns.—Partial returns have been received from some of the States which have just held their Presidential elections. They are so imperfect, however, that we will only give a few items as we find them in the Wednesday morning papers. Ohio has gone for Clay by a vote somewhat larger than for the Whig Governor lately elected. Pennsylvania gives a majority for Polk, but it is not determined how large. New Hampshire has likewise gone for Polk. Maryland, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, have given majorities for Clay. In New York city, Polk has a majority of between 1,900 and 2,000. Kings County and Richmond County have given about 400 majority for Clay, and elected the Whig Congressman.

Editorial Change.—Henry C Deming, Esq., formerly editor of the New World, has recently connected himself with Edmund B. Green, in the editorial charge of the Saturday Emporium.

INDIVIDUAL INFLUENCE.

The venerable Dr. Beecher, speaking of this subject once on a public occasion, made the following happy remarks:—

"He had a dream, which, like other dreams, did not wholly explain itself, and in which some of the natural objects had the power of speech. He was traveling near the sources of the Monongahela, and in passing over a rough country, at every short distance met a little stream which he could step over; but all of them were going the same way. At last he asked one where he was going. 'Why,' replied the little rill, 'I am going to New Orleans. I heard the people there want a great canal a thousand miles long and fifteen hundred feet wide, and I am going to help make it.' 'And pray, what can you do?' 'I don't know what I can do, but I shall be there.' And so saying, it hurried on.

"He came to another, and asked the same question, and received the same answer. All were hurrying on to make the grand canal, on which the steamships of the west, with their heavy burdens, were to be transported. On the heads of the Alleghany, the Scioto, and the Mississippi, he found thousands more of fitful streams hurried on by the same impulses, and which, while he yet spoke to them, hurried out of sight. None knew what he could do, but all were determined to do something. He passed on to the mighty Mississippi, and there he found the canal was made! The noble steamships rode proudly on its surface, and as its waters diminished, they were again replenished to the brim by every mountain-spring and every stream. Thus do the little rills make the stream, the stream the river, till the united waters of the whole pour on their way rejoicing to the glorious ocean. So is man to the mass, and the mass to the grand tide of human affairs. Each little mortal, weak and weary though he be, can do something in making up the mighty stream of human events as it rolls to the ocean of eternity."

EUROPEAN NEWS—7 DAYS LATER.

The steamship Hibernia reached Boston on Saturday night last, with 112 passengers, and news to the 19th ult.

There had been more incendiarism in the agricultural districts in the vicinity of London.

Mr. O'Connell seems to be making progress with his scheme of federal association.

Louis Philippe terminated his visit on the 14th, and the next day reached Calais, by way of Dover, where he was enthusiastically received by the people. The Queen, who had been anxiously awaiting his arrival at Treport, learning his destination, met him at Calais.

The char-a-banc sent by Louis Philippe to the Queen, cost, it is said, 60,000 francs—£1200.

It is rumored in Paris that Victor Hugo is to be raised to the French peerage, at the suggestion of Madame Adelaide, the King's sister.

Mr. Everett, the American Minister, who had been absent for some time on the Continent, has returned to England.

The Archipelago is infested with pirates to such a degree, that even King Otho's cutter yacht has been plundered, and every soul on board butchered!

We learn from Parma, that the theatre of the ancient city has just been discovered at a considerable depth in the earth, and in a remarkable state of preservation. The Government has ordered researches to be made, and has purchased several houses which stand in the way of the operation.

The Silesian Gazette states, from Poland, October 1, that about twenty students had recently been arrested at Warsaw, on a charge of being members of a secret society. The younger of them, who were only from twelve to fourteen years old, were, it is added, sent into the interior of Russia, but the others were sent to the army of Circassia, as common soldiers.

A letter from Constantinople, of the 25th ult., mentions that a fire had broken out near the Bazaar in that city, which destroyed upwards of 100 houses and 500 shops.

The Customs receipts at the port of Liverpool, for the quarter just ended, is nearly £240,000 more than the corresponding quarter of 1842, having now reached £1,325,000.

Mr. Salomons, a member of the Jewish persuasion, and a partner in an eminent commercial house in the city, who was recently elected for the office of Alderman for the Ward of Portsekon, has been rejected by the Court of Aldermen of London. The rejection has given rise to a good deal of surprise, and to some controversy.

The Steam Ship Great Britain.—A report is now current in England, that this magnificent vessel is just now about to be released from her confinement. Our private accounts from Bristol this morning state, that an amicable arrangement had been made with the Bristol Dock Company for taking down the walls, to enable her to pass through the locks; and it is expected that she will float into the basin about the 30th inst., and into the river sometime in November. It is not improbable, however, that during the winter months she may remain in a state of inactivity—either at London or Liverpool—ready to start on her Atlantic career with the early dawnings of Spring.

A Titled Baptist Preacher.—On the evening of the 13th instant, Lord Teynham, late Right Hon R. P. Curzon, preached at the new Baptist Chapel, corner of Myrtle-street and Hope-street, of which Rev. James Lister is the minister. His lordship is a distinguished preacher among the Baptists, and is on his way to Ireland. The chapel was densely crowded in every part.

American Year Clocks.—The year clocks, manufactured by Mr. Crane, of Newark, United States, have excited some attention in England, from the elaborate description of the machinery which appeared in many of the papers.

Railway to the Lakes.—The poet Wordsworth has protested, in a sonnet in the Morning Post, against the projected railway connecting Kendal with Windermere. In a note to the sonnet, he has brought prose to bear against the unpoetical desecration of the "Lake" District.

There are forty projected lines of railway, extending over a distance of 2,173 miles, and involving an estimated expenditure of £39,695,000.

The slave trade to the Brazils has greatly diminished since 1839. In that year, 30,290 slaves were smuggled; in 1840, 14,910; in 1841, 8,370: and in 1842, 8,891.

There is nothing from the Continent worth the trouble of reading or copying.

From the Indian Country.—The Cherokee Advocate contains the following items of intelligence:

A lamentable and unprecedented mortality has befallen the servants of the Cherokee Nation.—Within less than six months, the seat of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, that of the President of the National Committee, and those of four Members of the Council, have been vacated by death.

A number of emigrants, having about 20 wagons in company, crossed the Arkansas river, near Port Smith, some two weeks ago, moving out of Texas back to Missouri.

A young man recently from Texas, informs us that there is a great scarcity of bread stuffs in Lamar and the neighboring counties.

Perfect tranquility and order reign throughout our country, and, so far as we know, along the whole Western frontier.

We learn from the Advocate that since the report of Gov. Butler was made out, the number of Public Schools in the Nation has been increased from eleven to eighteen, which number has been in operation during the past year. Such intelligence is truly gratifying.

The principal Chief of the Nation receives only $500 per annum. Members of the National Council, $3 per day, and Supreme Judges $5 per day, while their respective bodies are in session. Circuit Judges receive $250 per annum, and District Judges $100.

From Tahiti.—Dates from Tahiti to the 15th of July have been received by a whaler, at New Bedford, Mass. Her Captain reports, that about the 10th of July, an action took place between the French troops and natives, in which a large number of lives were lost, principally on the part of the natives. The French were strongly fortifying the island; the English missionaries were leaving, and confusion reigned among the inhabitants.

The Mormons.—The latest news is, that the trial of Sharp and Williams is going on at Carthage. A correspondent of the Republican, under date of Oct. 22, says:

> Several subpœnas have been issued for witnesses, who did not expect to be called on; one or two of which have been served, and others avoided. My opinion is that no indictments will be found against any one—certainly not against Sharp.
>
> The rumor last night was, that one or two hundred Mormons were encamped in the woods, a mile or two north of Carthage, and that they are all armed, but for what purpose nothing definite seems to be known.
>
> The rumor of the Mormon encampment turns out to be true. It is certainly true that 150 to 200 Mormons are encamped within a few miles of Carthage—but for what purpose is as yet a matter of conjecture. There is also a company of Indians encamped a few miles off, who appear to be there for no purpose known or understood by the citizens.
>
> There is much excitement manifested at Carthage in consequence; and I much fear that an outbreak will be the result. In the meantime the business of the Court is progressing with its usual quiet.

The Explosion of the Lucy Walker.—The Louisville Courier of the 28th ult. says: "The number of persons killed by steamboat accidents, is generally much exaggerated in first accounts, We regret to say such is not the case with the Lucy Walker. Our first impression was, that some 50 or 60 persons were killed. We are now satisfied that there were not less than 80 persons killed and drowned—and more than probable the number will reach nearly if not quite 100. Had not the snag boat Gopher been so near as to give such prompt assistance, not more than, and probably not as many as, a half a dozen out of the large number of souls on board, would have been left to tell the sad tale.

Singular.—The steamboat Lucy Walker was blown up on the Ohio river a few days since, by which sixty or seventy lives were lost. The Louisville Courier, of the 25th ult., gives the following remarkable circumstance connected with it. "It will be recollected by our readers, that we mentioned that the body of a man was blown 150 feet into the air, and fell with such force as to break through the deck of the Lucy Walker. This occurrence was the means of saving the lives of two or three persons, who were confined beneath by the deck falling on them, but who were enabled to escape through the hole thus made.

Lowell.—We are indebted to a friend for the statistics of Lowell manufactures; from which we learn that the whole amount of capital invested in mannfactures in that place is over $11,000,000.

Bales of cotton used per annum,		62,040
Pounds of wool,	do. do.	1,000,000
Tons of anthracite coal,	do. do.	12,500
Gallons of Oil,	do. do.	67,849.
Spindles,		201,078
Yards of cloth made per week,		1,425,800

The amount of wool, 1,000,000 lbs., consumed in the Lowell factories, if we allow 3 lbs. to a sheep, would require for its production more than 330.000 sheep.

The same woollen factories which consume 1,000,000 lbs. of wool per annum, consume in the same period 3,000,000 teazels, another agricultural production, which yields a handsome profit to the producer.

The number of hands employed in the Lowell factories is 8640. They receive in wages 1,800,000 per annum, and consume of course a vast amount of the products of the soil, in the shape of beef, pork, mutton, veal, poultry, cheese, eggs, flour, corn, potatoes and other vegetables.

Two Cents Postage and Two Cents Mileage.—In England, the penny postage is followed by an act of parliament, that all new railway companies shall be obliged to run one cheap train every day, at a fare not exceeding one penny sterling per mile. The penny postage, which has so re-awakened the social affections of the people, and set them to writing letters, is soon followed by the penny mileage, which allows them to visit each other at a cheap rate. So it will be here.

The Coming Winter.—We hear it foretold by our veteran farmers that the coming winter will be a tolerably severe one. They say they have never seen a season of great abundance, especially in fruit, that was not followed by a hard winter; the summer, also, has been rather wet than otherwise, and this may be set down as another sign for a cold winter. But be this as it may, the farmer should provide well for the season of snow and frost, by saving all his straw; carefully curing and housing or stacking his cornstalks; and immediately harvesting and pitting any roots which may be left in the field. Straw and cornstalks, with a little bran or a few roots, will carry stock through the winter, if of a good breed, as well as the best of hay. Save all these, for there is nothing like having a little too much of everything on hand; no suffering ever comes from this cause, but from carelessness, or being too penurious to provide for the comfort and good condition of our domestic animals.

Forger Arrested—Suicide.—We learn that a man named Joseph Elder, a Clerk in the Bank of England, who committed a forgery by which he obtained £8,000 in sovereigns, and fled to this country, was arrested in this city yesterday, and committed to jail; and this morning he was found dead in his cell, having committed suicide during the night by hanging himself. After his arrest he was examined by Solomon Lincoln, Esq., U. S. Marshal, who found in his possession certificates of Railroad Bond and U. S. Stock to the amount of $34,013 and 400 sovereigns. He was apparently about 60 years of age. [Boston Transcript, Nov. 1.

Perils of the Guano Trade.—Some of the crews engaged in this trade have had severe conflicts with the Arabs. Some sailors who were taken captives, had their wounds dressed by the Arabs in a style of surgery which few would relish. The natives used a rough knife, and burned out the wounds with a red hot nail. While this terrible operation was going on, the Arab spectators were laughing. One of the captives had his skull fractured; they scraped his head very rougly, twice a day, and filled the wound with a kind of powder. Their other operations were of a similar character.

Emigrants for Liberia.—The Colonization Herald says, arrangements have been entered into between the Pennsylvania Colonization Society and the Maryland Colonization Society, by which the latter agrees to send out with its own emigrants to Liberia, the slaves, 27 in number, recently manumitted by Mr. Wilson, of Kentucky. The Pennsylvania Society has volunteered the guardianship of these people, with a view to seeing them safely embarked for Liberia, and has undertaken to pay the expenses of travel and passage. Its agent, Mr. Pinney, is now on his way to Kentucky, to give effect to these intentions.

The Steamer Missouri.—It is said that Messrs. Lovell & Marshall have already expended fifteen thousand dollars in the attempt to raise the wreck of this unfortunate vessel. They still hope to be successful. The plan of operation is, to plank up the vessel to high water mark, and then pump out the water which is in the hull. In the event of their proving successful, they will be entitled to half of the property recovered.

Remarkable Courage and Preservation.—Last week, as the young son, George, aged about four years, of Rev. Josiah M. Graves, of Westfield Society, in this town, was climbing over the fence on the premises of Rev. Mr. Goodwin, he pitched in or fell into the well. His elder brother, eight years old, immediately hastened home, a distance of several rods, and informed Mrs. Graves. She ran as fast as possible, and on arriving at the well, found him holding on to the stones. She lowered the bucket, and told him to take hold of it. The courageous little fellow said he could not reach it, but made the attempt, and, losing his hold, sunk to the bottom, but on rising again, caught hold of the stones. Mrs. Graves then descended the well, but being unable to secure the little fellow to the bucket, was obliged to ascend to obtain something. This she did, again descended, succeeded in securing him to the bucket, and he was drawn up in safety. Little George remarked, on being got out, that when he went to the bottom he found a dipper, but was unable to hold on to it! There were eight or ten feet of water in the well, and it was about the same distance to the water. The courage and presence of mind of Mrs. Graves and her little son are deserving of notice.

Murder.—About 11 o'clock on Friday morning last, James Gaston, aged about forty years, employed as a nurse in the Invalid Department of the Eastern Penitentiary, Philadelphia, was murdered in the most shocking manner by an insane prisoner named John Billman, a native of Wilmington, Lycoming County, who was committed some 14 months ago for horse stealing.

The prisoner was making a noise in his cell, when the keeper approached him, in order to quiet him. Billman rushed to the door, but was prevented from coming out by a gentle push of the hand, when he instantly seized a board, struck the old man upon the head, who fell to the floor. The deranged convict then stamped his victim to death, tore off his clothing, a portion of which he placed upon his own person, and ran to the main gate of the prison, where he demanded permission to depart from the clerk.

The alarm was soon raised, and Billman safely secured. He confessed all, and also acknowledged having murdered his own father some years since. The Coroner was sent for—a jury empanneled—who rendered the following verdict: "That the deceased came to his death from blows inflicted by John Billman, while he, Billman, was in a state of mental derangement."

Mr. Beckford.—The will of the late Mr. Beckford was recently proved at Doctors' Commons. At ten years of age he succeeded to the enormous income of £100,000 a year. He expended £273,000 upon Fonthill, which he made a place of unparalleled magnificence. In December, 1822, the great tower fell, destroying a considerable part of the mansion, which was rebuilt at an immense expense. In consequence of excessive expenditure, and other circumstances, he sold his property, which was purchased by Mr. Farquhar for £333,000; and Mr. Beckford, with his diminished fortune, retired to Bath. His property has been sworn to as under £80,000.

Slaves Liberated.—Nathaniel H. Hooe, of King George county, Va. lately deceased, left by his will nearly all his slaves free, amounting to some 200 or 300, with ample provision to carry them to Liberia. The liberated slaves are to be removed under the direction of the Colonization Society. [Balt Sun.

The Cherokee Advocate is the name of an able weekly newspaper, neatly printed in the Cherokee and English languages, just started at Tahlequah, Cherokee Nation. It is edited by Wm. P. Ross, Esq. a nephew of the celebrated John Ross, the present Chief of the Cherokees, and is published by the authority and at the expense of the Nation. Success to it and the Cherokees.

Naturalization and Illegal Voting.—In one of the Wards of the city of Baltimore, at the late election, it appears that a large number of votes were polled above the aggregate of ascertained voters. The question arose where the votes came from—a question which is answered in another paragraph, in a manner which shows the folly of our present naturalization laws.

"We have the fact from a collector of rents, who had occasion to make frequent calls upon the widow of a deceased foreigner, occupying a small tenement under his charge, and receive his rent in small instalments. A day or two, however, after the late election, he made her a call, and was surprised to find her fully prepared and honestly willing to pay up all arrearages. Upon inquiring how she became possessed of the ample means—she replied with a complacent smile, perfectly unconscious, no doubt, of the impropriety of the act, that she 'had loaned out the paper of her dear old man—pace to his ashes—for a dollar each time, to seventeen persons, and by that manes was able to pay her rent.'"

Cedar Bedsteads.—It is a well established fact, proven by the experience of housekeepers in the South and West, that if bedsteads, clothes' presses, clothes' chests, &c., be made of red cedar, they will never be troubled with bed-bugs, moths, roaches, or other insects. The deeper the color, and stronger scented the wood, the better. Florida red cedar is not quite so good for these purposes as cedar growing in higher latitudes, provided it be sufficiently large and free from knots.

English Agricultural Laborers.—The wretched condition of this class was made apparent at a meeting of their "order" held recently in Wiltshire, where a woman, Mary Ferris, said, that the men, many of them, were afraid to speak. A voice answered, that they who were living on potatoes and water had not the spirit to do so. Mary Ferris proceeded: "she thought a little more land would be of great service to the laborers generally. Her husband had to maintain her and five children out of 8s. per week. They had half an acre of land; but that was not sufficient, with his low wages, to maintain them in a manner fitting to do a day's work. This last summer they had no potatoes for a considerable length of time, and nothing but the 8s. per week. Her children were often crying round her for food, and she did not know how to get any. She said the men knew nothing of their hardships in comparison to the women; they brought the 8s. home on Saturday night; but the management was left to the women, who could not supply the wants of their families from it." She stated that they did not taste a morsel of animal food for two months together. All the laborers who did speak complained of their miserable state.

Poisoned Sheep.—A traveler in Connecticut, perceiving three sheep in a pasture either dead or dying, ascertained that they had been eating some vegetable poison. One died, but before the other two expired a spoonful of spirits turpentine was administered, and they both recovered.

Carpets.—The oftener these are taken up and shaken, the longer they will wear, as the dust and dirt underneath grind them out. Sweep carpets with a stiff hair brush, instead of an old corn broom, if you wish them to wear long or look well. At any rate, keep a good broom purposely for the carpet.

If the weather be favorable henceforward, there will be a fair crop.

Northern Texas is fast filling up; emigrants are pouring into that section more rapidly than any other portion of the Republic. Four hundred families from Missouri and Illinois have lately settled on the upper Trinity, they are, the old pioneers of the Western States, and are well armed, and prepared to defend themselves against Mexicans or Indians.

The Emigrating Associations in Germany are about to send a thousand families to Texas. This is the result of the Prince de Solmes' visit. TO RHODE ISLAND.

A blessing on thee, "Father-land,"
Thou land of rock and sea,
Of island gems, and legends wild,
And hearts, the good and free;
The gifted and the beautiful,
All that we love or prize,
Make thee, fair "garden of the west,"
A type of Paradise.

Thine exiled children turn to thee
From earth's fair bowers of rest,
And long to throw them once again
On thy maternal breast;
But Fate, that "flaming sword," forbids—
God grant the wanderers grace,
Meekly, thy well-remembered lore
On their young homes to trace.

Thy sons, like autumn leaves, are strewn
Upon the dark blue sea,
A noble race, and proud to boast
Their pure nativity;
There are the cunning workman's hopes
Of gain, "there go the ships,"
And there thy gifts like pebbles pave
Old ocean's trackless deeps.

They call thee, 'mong thy sister States,
A little one; but then,
I claim for thee, in measurement,
The standard claim'd by men.
What though in roods and acres small,
No crown, no tyrant's claim,
Nor stain of slavery, may mar
The glory of thy name.

I wonder not, since I have seen
Thy time-defying brow,
Thou art so like thy youthful self,
As we behold thee now.
Mature, yet fading not, still firm,
With unblench'd heart and eye,
Thy love shall be earth's last to fade
From many a memory.

It must be so, while nature's chords
Are link'd with ancestry;
A thousand yearning hearts exclaim,
My fathers sleep with thee!
Heaven hear the frequent prayers that rise,
Forgive the tear that starts,
For thee, thou Mecca of our love,
Thou home of many hearts.

SHILOH, N. J. L. M. C.

A TRUE NARRATIVE.

It was a cold, bleak night. Mother and I were sitting in the back parlor, waiting for father to come home to tea. The bell rang and a friend entered the room. He asked if father was at home. He said he had brought some one to see him who was in trouble, and wished to ask his advice.—Mother told him to bring the person in, and wait, as she expected father would be at home very soon. He stepped into the hall, and returned with a colored man, who looked to be about 50 years old.

He was poorly clothed, and appeared to be in great want. Mother asked what was the matter, for she began to suspect that he was one of those poor people who run off from slavery. Our friend said he had better tell his own story. He began as well as his tears and sobs would suffer him to speak, to tell us that he was a freeman, that his wife and children were slaves, but that they had always lived with him in a little cottage he had built for them near their master's plantation. They worked for their master, while he took care of the little farm he had rented. He had got a written promise from the owner of his family that he would sell to him when he should have raised several hundred dollars.

"What!" exclaimed Ellen, "sell the man his own wife and children?"

"Yes, Ellen, and he did much more than that. The poor black man thought it a great privilege to be permitted to buy them; but just two nights before, while he was from home on some business, his wife and eight children were taken from their house, hurried down the river, and put on board a boat that had stopped for them.

"He had reached home soon after they had been taken away, and followed them to a boat. The captain permitted him to get on board, and he had come as far as he could with them. He thought perhaps he should find some one here to help him. They were now at the wharf, and he had but a few hours to see what could be done. Before noon next day, they would be on their way to the far South, 'and O!' said the poor man, 'how can I give them up? Last night,' he continued, 'when we had all lain down on the deck to sleep, my littlest boy, that I love the best of all my children, crept close to me, put his arms round my neck and said, 'O, father, how can I live if they take me away from you?'

"The poor man wept so while he told his story that he could scarcely speak."

"You must be telling me this story, sister," said Ellen, "as they do in the story books. It is not all true, is it?"

"Yes, Ellen, it is all true: I saw the man myself, and mother will tell you much more about him than I can. He went back home to try if he could not sell his horse and cow and corn for money to buy them back, but when he got there he found his stock driven off, his corn-field destroyed by the neighbor's cattle, and almost every thing taken from his house. Mother knows many more such things."

"Did he ever hear from them, sister?"

"Yes, he heard from them once. Their cruel master had not found any one to buy them, and the little boy, who grieved so much for his father, was dead."

"Poor little fellow, and he never saw his father again!"

"No, never! I cannot think of that night without feeling sad. I had often heard of such things, but I had never before seen any one in so deep distress."

"But come, Ellen, you look sorry; I am sure my dear little sister will never take young birds from their mother again, and she will pity and help these poor mothers and fathers, who are robbed of their children."—Youth's Visiter.

THE POWER OF TRUTH.

The celebrated Gilbert West and Lord Lyttleton, both men of acknowledged talent, had received the principles of infidelity from a superficial view of the Scriptures. They agreed together to expose what they termed the imposture of the Bible, and Mr. West chose the resurrection of Christ, and Lord Lyttleton the conversion of St. Paul, as the subjects of their criticism. Both sat down to their respective tasks, full of prejudice, and a contempt for Christianity. But what was the result? They were both converted by their endeavors to overthrow the truth of the Scriptures. They came together, not as they expected, to exult over an imposture exposed to ridicule, but to lament their former unbelief, and to congratulate each other that they had discovered the truth of revelation. They published their inquiries, which form two of the most valuable treatises now existing in favor of the truth of God's word, one entitled, "Observations on the Conversion of St. Paul," and the other, "Observations on the Resurrection of Christ."

THE DIGNITY OF LABOR.

We respect the laborer, the man who toils with his hands from day to day, in some useful employment. He is adding something to the wealth of the public, something for the comfort around him; something to adorn nature. To the laborer, the actual laborer, are we indebted for all the attainments of art. Forests have been felled, mountains have been levelled, beautiful towns erected, and almost innumerable changes wrought in the rough exterior of the world by manual labor. When we see the deep cuts and the great elevations which are made in grading for railroads, the wonderful improvements of modern date, we think each laborer's name should be carved in the solid rock of some of the mountain passes, as enduring memorials of the triumph of skill and industry. The mass of mankind, we are aware, think differently from us; they only looking at first causes, bestow the credit of all their works of art upon the successful accumulations and liberal investers of capital, while the poor laborer, whose sweat and toil have produced both the wealth and its fruits, is overlooked and forgotten. The whole community has been properly divided into two classes, the producers, and the non-producers. In the first are included all actual operatives; in the last, those who live by craft, or are supported in their indulgence. Though the latter esteem themselves far higher in the scale of being than the former, yet they are entirely dependent upon them, and should the laborers cease to work they would be in the condition of children when deprived of their natural protector and the means which he had furnished to sustain their existence. Instead, therefore, of feeling dependent on employers or awed by capitalists, the laborer should assert and maintain his just rights and his proper position in society. The submission of the laborer to usurpation, has more than any other cause tended to degrade industry. The feelings that all employers were a sort of masters, and the employed partial slaves, has prevailed to a very great extent, and it is high time the error, a gross and aggravated one, were forever exploded. AFFECTING SCENE IN INDIA.

A Brahmin youth was lately received into the Scotch Free Mission Church, at Madras, he having publicly renounced idolatry by throwing away his Brahmin string and cutting off the sacred locks from his head; he then staid at the school-rooms where the missionaries live, and did not go home as usual to his parents. His father, an elderly Brahmin, came towards night seeking him. They had a long conversation: the father urging, and entreating, and commanding his son to leave and go home with him; the son stating that he must forsake heathenism, and would not return home. The father then said he might be a Christian at home as others were, and he would not hinder him; but the son told him that he could not live among idolators; that he must come out and be separate, and that he was resolved to forsake father and mother, and all his friends, to follow Christ.

As his father could not persuade him to go, he left him with many tears. The same night the Brahmin youth broke cast and ate with the missionaries. In the morning his mother and other female friends came weeping and lamenting aloud; but he would not see them. He was taken to the police office, but allowed, as he wished to do so, to return to the missionaries. This is a very interesting event, especially as a very few Brahmins in this part of India have ever been converted. It has created much stir among the natives, and they have taken away many of their children from the school. Indeed, all our schools have been affected by it; but there is abundant occasion to rejoice in the conversion. [From Rev. Mr. Winslow.

COURTSHIP OF A BASHFUL CLERGYMAN.—The Rev. John Brown, of Haddington, the well-known author of the Self-Interpreting Bible, was a man of singular bashfulness. In token of the truth of this statement, I need only state that his courtship lasted seven years. Six years and a half had passed away, and the Rev. gentleman had got no further forward than he had been the first six days. This state of things became intolerable; a step in advance must be made, and Mr. Brown summoned all his courage for the deed.

"Janet," said he, as they sat one night in solemn silence, "we've been acquainted now for six years an' mair, and I've ne'er gotten a kiss yet; d'ye think I might take one, ma bonnie girl?" "Just as you like, John, only be becoming and proper wi'it." "Surely, Janet, we'll ask a blessing."

The blessing was asked—the kiss was taken—and the worthy divine, perfectly overpowered with the blissful sensation, most rapturously exclaimed, "O, woman! But it is gude—we'll return thanks."

Six months made the pious couple man and wife, and, added his descendant, who humorously told the tale, a happier couple never spent a long and useful life together.

BEGGARS.—It is estimated that among the 178,000,000 of individuals, who inhabit Europe, there are seventeen million beggars! or persons who subsist at the expense of the community, without contributing to its resources.

The manner of asking alms varies in different countries. The Germans go singing through the streets. The French fawn, flatter and entreat—the Dutch make low bows, and silently hold out their hats—the Bohemians tell fortunes—the Portuguese sigh and weep—the Italians harangue with zeal and eloquence—the English swear like pirates, especially if unsuccessful—the Spaniards ask alms with a dignity and propriety which would do honor to a judge or counsellor.

DISTURBED STATE OF THE INDIANS.—We learn by a passenger who arrived here from Shreveport in the steamboat Robert T. Lytle, that the Indians in the neighborhood of Fort Ouachita had risen, and were in a state of open hostility with the neighboring whites. So very alarming had become their position, that on Sunday last an express was despatched to Fort Jesup for a force of three companies of U. S. troops to quell them.

[New Orleans Picayune, Oct. 20

We give below the first two numbers of a series of articles by Dr. WM. A. ALCOTT. The series was prepared expressly for the Advocate of Moral Reform, and will be read with interest by many admirers of the popular author of the Young Wife, Young Housekeeper, etc.

THE SOURCES OF LICENTIOUSNESS.

PRELIMINARY REMARKS.

The sources of licentiousness are as innumerable as those of the Mississippi. We have explored the principal streams of human corruption, and reported our progress. In all this, we have done well. We have made a good beginning. It was necessary that we should begin somewhere; and what more natural than that we should commence our labors in endeavoring first to exhaust the stream of impurity at its mouth?

True it is, that while doing this, the turbid waters of death have continued to flow. But we have been led, thereby, to explore the stream higher up, and to discover some of its tributaries. This has enabled us to labor to better purpose than if we had confined our efforts to our first crude attempt.

Nor is this all. The higher we ascend—the more we penetrate among the hills whence the waters come, the more numerous—like drops of the morning dew—do we find the streams and rills and fountains that go to make up the mighty flood of licentiousness; and the deeper must be our convictions of the importance of having a perfect chart of the whole.

To speak without figure. Though much has been done—much that it was indispensable we should do—we shall accomplish but little in this great cause while we confine our efforts to the mere correction of existing evils. Correction is indeed worth something, whereno more can be done; but here, as every where else, prevention is worth at least nine times as much. And in no cause whatever is prevention more loudly called for, than in what is popularly called the cause of Moral Reform. In order to exterminate an evil like licentiousness, we shall do well to go as near the fountain head of impurity as possible.

To be able to do this, a thorough knowledge is necessary of the whole human being—body, soul, and spirit. These we must understand, moreover, in all their relations, as well as structure. For manifest reasons, however, the knowledge of one of these divisions of the human being, the body, has been, till recently, cloistered up—inaccessible to the great mass of the community, especially that class who most need it; I mean mothers and teachers.

I have spoken of relations. Structure and law—in other words anatomy and physiology, especially the latter—are immeasurably important; but they are more important as preliminaries to relations or hygiene, than when considered in a manner more isolated. What is wanted, is a knowledge of the right use of ourselves. We never shall fully understand the abuse of a thing, till we first know its use. And in determining the use of man, it is indispensably necessary that we study him in all his relations.

Practical hygiene will, it is acknowledged, involve, continually, more or less not only of anatomy and physiology, but of pathology, psychology, philosophy, chemistry, and even theology, and especially the theology and philosophy of the Bible. In studying the relations of man with a view to the right knowledge of uses and abuses, the philosophy of the Bible will afford us much aid. Direct revelation, indeed, on this subject, we have not, at least to any great extent; but then we have deep and great principles revealed to us, such as that which is involved in the statement of Paul, so forcibly reiterated, that Christians are the temples of the Holy Spirit; and that God wills or desires that these temples should be sanctified.

In the remarks, therefore, which are to follow, and to which this brief essay is intended to be merely preliminary, while endeavoring, for the benefit of mothers and teachers, to point to some of the sources of licentiousness,—some of the ten thousand smaller streams that wind their way among the hills to form our larger rivers—I shall endeavor to keep in constant application the great moral truths which, in compassion to our ignorance, have been made known from the Mercy-seat. The sanctification of soul and body, is a work which needs all the philosophy of heaven above, as well as the earth beneath. Here, emphatically, while we should not close our eyes to light from any quarter, do we need the light and wisdom that come from God.

Nor can the wisdom of earth and heaven be separated, especially in the study of the uses and abuses of man.—Both are indispensable. More than even this; it is no doubt true, that one cause of the slow progress of truth and purity in the earth, has been the unnatural divorce of what God in his wise providence joined together, and which never ought to have been sundered.

NO. II.—THE LOVE OF EXCITEMENT.

Nothing tends more to awaken and develope licentiousness than that unnatural and unhealthy excitement which every where prevails, and which is manifestly increasing. No complaint is more loudly made by medical men, than of the increase and severity of nervous maladies—which increase is largely owing to the increased love of excitement. If the brain and nervous system are not enlarged by it, they are made more active—perhaps I should say more excitable, or even more irritable.

I knew a female teacher in one of our cities, a few years since, who was obliged to make and enforce a law prohibiting her pupils from expending more than twelve and a half cents a week for confectionary. But the young ladies of this school were not alone in their fondness for excitement. They were, in all probability, but a fair sample of the members of our schools generally; and, indeed, of the great mass of our young people of both sexes.

Nor is confectionary the only form of physical excitement which our youth should be taught to avoid. For though it is a terrible evil, and most intimately connected with licentiousness, it is little more so than a thousand other things which have a better name, but which have not been, as yet, so generally proscribed.

The excessive use of salted food has long been a source—indirectly so, of licentious tendencies. . . . . I mean here, more especially, food which is preserved in salt; though salt in any way is believed to have a degree of the same effect. It is in this view, that Dr. Rush ventured to raise the question, whether the fabled notion that Venus rose from the sea, had not its origin in the general notion among the ancients, that the salt of the sea water had the tendency in question.

I am not about to inveigh against the dietetic use of salt in moderate quantity. What I aim at is its excessive use, especially in the way of pickling or preserving food, such as butter, fish, flesh, cucumbers, &c. Salt applied to food after it is prepared and placed on the table, is far less injurious, in similar quantities, than when it is incorporated into the texture of our food.

And yet I find most persons among us not only exceedingly fond of salted meats of every kind, but exceedingly free in their use. I believe, indeed, that the love of excitement is implanted in our nature; and this for wise purposes; and that most persons in civilized countries are fond of the form of excitement of which I am speaking.—But it is one thing to be fond of a substance which is exciting, unduly so, and quite another to yield to the demands of a clamorous appetite.

I do not greatly wonder when I see coarse-minded men—whether in city or country, whether behind the counter, in the study, the field, the road, or the ditch—taking down in considerable quantities, bacon, salt beef, salted fish, sausages, and pickles; for as they have been trained, I expect no less from them than a submission to their appetites and propensities. They have never been accustomed to deny themselves any thing which is agreeable to their taste, provided it does not cause immediate or extensive pain.

But when I see females—delicate females as they often are—and above all, giving to their children these exciting substances, I tremble for fear of the consequences. More than this, I cannot help being disgusted. Did they know the tendency, on their animal frames, especially when acting in conjunction with numerous other causes, few, I am quite sure, would persevere in their use.

Let me not be misunderstood. I say not these things in compliment, but from conviction. Woman, though when perverted she sometimes becomes the "worst of men," is nevertheless originally much more pure than man; and I should be sadly disappointed not to find her acting up more nearly to her convictions of truth and duty. Let her but know the tendency of salted and pickled substances on her own nerves, and in heating her blood, and keeping up the love of excitement, and their still more injurious tendency on her companion man, and I am sure she would refrain from their use were it only on selfish principles—from a regard to the influence of her example.

Here is one instance of female misrule. That woman rules the world, directly or indirectly, has long ago been conceded. But that she does not always rule well, is, I suppose, equally well known. In this instance, she first excites her own passions and appetites, and renders them imperious; then, by her example, encourages this same excitement in her husband; and lastly, both parties join in transmitting, in more than one or two ways, the same fondness for excitement in their offspring.

TO PARENTS—POWER OF HABIT.

In view of the power of habit we see the responsibility of parents. Their children are forming their habits for life. How important that those habits should all be right habits—habits the child may safely cultivate forever. Parents are under peculiar obligations to form the habits of their children after a correct model. It is important. First, because in childhood and youth habits can easily be formed. A child can be led and directed much easier than a grown up strong and independent man.

Human life is like a river which takes its rise in a spring which you can turn in any direction with your hand if you place it near its source. But go further down to where the little rill has become a river and try to resist then, and it will swell and overflow the obstruction, or bear it away in triumph with its accumulated waters.

On the summit of one of the ridges of the Allegany mountains, by the side of the road, at the foot of a peake which rises far above, there issues from a fissure in the rock a bright spring of sparkling waters. Beside this stream, the traveller often stops to refresh himself and play with the waters, turning them eastward or westward at his will. If he places his foot on the west side, then the waters flow eastward, they run down the mountain side, mix with the bright Potomac, and the silvery drops roll on, until all obstructions forever passed, and beyond the reach of putrefaction and stagnation, they commingle themselves with the soft waters of the Atlantic Ocean.

If, however, he places his foot on the eastern side, then the waters flow down on the western side—unite with the head waters of the Monongahela—and are discharged into the Ohio, thence into the Mississippi, and down that muddy filthy stream—the sewer of the western world—those once bright drops flow on, until either lost among its stagnant marshes, or embittered or corrupted by the concurrent mass, they assume the same dark, sickening aspect—exhale the same nauseating smell, and undistinguished from the other waters, steaming with pollution, they are emptied into the Mexican Gulf and are lost amid the labyrinths of its shoals and islands.

Thus it is with the mind of a child. Like that spring it can be turned by a little influence, by your hand or foot in any direction.

If your influence is right, then the little child's habits and being will flow eastward, toward the sun-rising—it will be united with the stream of divine benevolence—and flow on brilliant and sparkling—clear as the pellucid wave on whose bosom it is borne onward—and onward and onward it will flow, bearing verdure and health and refreshing, wherever it goes—blessing and being blessed, down through eternal ages.

But should that mind receive in childhood a wrong bias—should the foot be placed on the eastern side, and the drops which give direction to manhood's stream, flow toward the darkened west. Should it learn to be selfish and unite in strong alliance with other selfish streams, onward it will flow—onward and onward, still deepening and darkening, putrid and reeking—embittering and being embittered, bearing desolation and ruin increasingly frightful and resistless as it dashes down the fathomless steeps of futurity.

If parents wish their children to love this world and barter their souls for gold, they have only to keep their eyes shut to other good, and both by precept and example, teach them to "be rich," if possible be rich, honestly if they can, but at all events be rich, and if they do not overdo the matter, and nothing more powerful intervene, that child's God will be Mammon, and on this altar he will sacrifice his soul.

Another fact which increases the responsibility of parents, is the implicit confidence the child reposes in them that they are right. It is hard for them to believe that their parents lie with lips or lives. Oh. 'tis thus we often see a father leading a group of little immortals in his own pathway towards death.

Again what makes the crime the greater still, is the fact that the parent knows the power of habit, he knows full well—for he has seen the influence of these beginnings. The child has no experience to apprise him of the influence of today's conduct upon the future life. In view of facts like these, how impressively should come home to every parent's bosom the injunction, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."

Let mothers ponder well the important principle brought out in the above extract. Remember that the habits which they help to form in their children, though to them they may seem of little consequence, "may prove links of tempered steel, binding a deathless being to eternal felicity or woe."

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location, thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y. The fall term will open on WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 14th, under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

THE FAMILY CHOIR.

Dear to my soul the choral song,
That swells the temple's arch along,
In hymns of praise,
Bidding the earth-bound spirit soar
Upward, and onward, by the power
Of holy lays.

And dear the congregated notes,
That fill the sky-roof'd grove, or float
Through field and bower,
Waking the earth to melody,
With matin chant, or vesper glee,
From tree and flower.

But memory in my heart awakes
A sweeter song, for their dear sakes
Who struck that lyre;
Such bands as angels wear above,
United in fraternal love
That household choir.

Yet more—a father's fostering care,
A mother's guardian love was there,
And childhood's strain;
Talk not of age, and cold decay,
And the chill'd heart, where love's warm ray
Hath ever lain.

Talk not to them of wealth, or power,
They ask, they wish no richer dower,
No purer bliss,
Than this deep fountain of the heart;
O, if earth has of heaven a part,
'Tis this, 'tis this!

But why, this side the enduring skies,
Exist these undecaying ties,
That chain the soul!
Or, why have chance and change the power
To touch those ties, which evermore
Do spurn control!

Full well I know the same sweet voice,
That makes the loving heart rejoice
With seraph strain,
Brings back the loved of other years,
The lost—oh, all too deep for tears,
The full heart's pain!

That household choir! I've watch'd them long,
And list'ned to their evening song,
Till my wrung heart
Wept for the future, for I know,
As days, and months, and years shall flow,
That choir must part!

The day will come, when round that sweet
Domestic altar, ye who meet
Shall meet no more,
To soothe with song the laboring breast,
But each dear harp be laid to rest,
Its tremblings o'er.

O, guard ye well the tuneful soul—
A charm—until ye reach the goal
Where woes expire;
Like Memnon, greet with melodies
A glorious dawn, and joyful rise,
A heavenly choir.

COLLECTIONS ON THE SABBATH.

To those unaccustomed to taking collections for religious purposes on the Sabbath, it may appear to be a matter of rather doubtful propriety. Is it right? is the first question that arises in such minds. This is a very proper question, and should be Scripturally considered. If it be not wrong, then, evidently, it is right. It is not wrong, unless it be a violation of the law of God. It is not a violation of the law of God, unless it be secular labor, or labor pertaining to this world. But the taking of collections for religious purposes is not a secular, but a religious business; it pertains not to the present, but principally to a future world. Therefore it is not a violation of the law of God.

It is not a violation of the law of God, unless it be inconsistent with "calling the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable." But it is not inconsistent with calling the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable, if, in this way, we delight to honor the holy Lord. Therefore it is not a violation of the law of God.

Taking collections for religious purposes on the Sabbath, is not a violation of the law of God, unless in it we be found "doing our own ways," and "finding our own pleasure." But in taking collections on the Sabbath we act religiously; and in "doing our own ways," and "finding our own pleasure," we act irreligiously. Therefore taking collections on the Sabbath is not a violation of the law of God.

The Great Expounder of the law has said, "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath;" and, "It is lawful to do well on the Sabbath days." But if the Sabbath may not be used for promoting the highest and the holiest interests of man, then man was made for the Sabbath, and not the Sabbath for man. We ought to distinguish between different objects in handling money. If a man handle it for the purpose of paying an ordinary debt, it is a secular business transaction. But if he handle it for the sole purpose of promoting the honor of God, it then becomes a religious duty, and is a kind of well-doing that is lawful on the Sabbath days.

If it be indeed unlawful to use money on the Sabbath, because it is an article used in ordinary traffic, then I ask if it be not unlawful to speak on the Sabbath, because words are used in ordinary business?

When we pray, on the Sabbath, for the promotion of truth and righteousness in the earth, if it would tend to diminish the ardor of our devotion, to contribute something to aid in carrying out the object prayed for, it would be an evidence that our prayers and our alms should not together "come up for a memorial before God." But this act of self denial, this offering up of our sacrifice together with our supplications, tends rather to foster the spirit of prayer. Therefore, its tendency being good, is an evidence that the thing itself is right.

If, then, this method is right, the next question is, Is it expedient? The affirmative of this question is so evident that it need scarcely be argued. If it is expedient to make the most of time and effort, then this method is expedient. It is expedient upon the same principle that labor-saving machines are expedient. When one, two, or three hundred persons are assembled together, it requires but a few minutes to do what otherwise might require as many days.

This method, perhaps more than any other, tends to equality; that some be not burdened while others are relieved. Its tendency is also to secure greater amounts in the end. "Large streams from little fountains flow." But the little fountains are continually pouring into them. "Tall oaks from little acorns grow." But it is by a process quite imperceptible. So if every one does a little, as the Lord has prospered him, and that frequently, it amounts to something in the end, and is scarcely missed. If this system should become general throughout the denomination, the result might astonish as well as gratify us all.

S. C.

For the Recorder.

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION.

"When ye, therefore, shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand.")

What is the abomination that maketh desolate? The Scriptures are said to be their best interpreter; and we read of a woman, Rev. 18: 5, with this inscription on her forehead, "Mystery, Babylon the great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth." But how has this abomination made the earth desolate? Let Isaiah answer this question, ch. 24: 5, "The earth also is defiled under the inhabitants thereof, because they have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinance, broken the everlasting covenant. Therefore hath the curse devoured the earth, and they that dwell therein are desolate," &c. The prophet continues, verse 10, "The city of confusion is broken down; every house is shut up, that no man may come in." Verse 12, "In the city is left desolation, and the gate is smitten with destruction."

In the days of Paul and Barnabas, Acts 13: 42–44, the glory of God, and the honor of Christ, the Lord of the Sabbath day, was seen even in a city of Gentiles, when "almost the whole city" were seen coming together on the seventh day, God's holy day, "to hear the word of God." And thus was the seventh day observed as the Sabbath by the believers and churches in the first centuries, whatever false teachers may say to the contrary notwithstanding.

But, since the Man of Sin, Antichrist, the little horn of Daniel's beast, the little horn of Daniel's goat, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth, has "transgressed the laws," [of the second and fourth commandments,] "changed the ordinance" [of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week,] cast the truth to the ground, changed times and laws, now, every house (of God) is shut up, (on the seventh day,) that no man may come in, according to the above words of Isaiah: and even in professedly Christian cities are left desolation; and the gate (of God's holy assembly for worship on the seventh day) is smitten with destruction. WHOSO READETH, LET HIM UNDERSTAND!

B. CLARK.

RELIGIOUS DECLENSION—ITS CAUSE AND CURE.

The Circular Letter of a New Hampshire Baptist Association, treats largely of the present religious declension, and inquires into its causes, and the remedies for it. Among the causes which it assigns, are, the worldliness of Christians, the existing political excitement, the prevalence of different ultraisms, and the reaction of former excitements. The remarks upon the last of these causes, are worthy of serious consideration, and we therefore copy them:

"The last cause of religious declension we will mention, is the present reaction of former excitements. And this, after all, we consider the great cause of all. We do not, however, refer to all religious excitement, with the design of objecting to the whole. You cannot have too much excitement about sin, and the importance of the gospel as the power to remove it from the individual, the church, and the world. We refer to artificial excitement, which consists in a machinery of means devised by men for this purpose—means that in the issue act upon the animal man instead of the spiritual, and crowd the church with men and women as Christians, when nothing more has been done than to arouse their sympathies and passions. And what is this machinery and the result? The church have concluded that they must have a revival, to enjoy an exciting occasion, call together multitudes, multiply their numbers, give themselves importance in the community, and then make a loud report to the world in the columns of a popular public journal. Thus they appoint a protracted meeting to continue for weeks, send off for an evangelist to preach on death, judgment, and eternity, and then invite every body to join in the scene about to be enacted. The wonderful preacher comes, the meeting commences, and the extraordinary means of grace, as they are called, are put in requisition, when, as if by magic, the whole town are to be turned into Christians. This eloquent divine calls on the whole church to awake, sustain his movement, and fully carry out whatever he sees fit to recommend, as if his 'ipse dixit' clothed the injunction with unearthly authority. Then he attacks the impenitent, in their refuge of lies, as he terms it, and addresses them with all the personality and vulgarity in his power, by the use of all sorts of anecdotes, figures of speech, and frightful representations to be any where found—and all this he accompanies with every manœuvre for immediate effect. All of the same and different churches who do not rush to the rescue by this train of operations, are attacked also, and denounced in the most unmeasured terms, and thus, if possible, be forced to fall in, or in the refusal wither and die under the sentence of his reprobation. This course of things goes on for weeks and months, and as much longer as possible, by every means, no matter what. This is the machinery, and the way it is kept in motion till it can move no longer. Now just analyze this process, and see if reaction, great and most fearful, must not in the nature of things, be the sure result. The minister of that people cannot continue to preach after this model, and always keep up an excitement—thus his connection with them must at once cease, that they may try something new and strange, the consequence of which is, at the outset, to entirely unsettle the ministry, and on their part to get up an itching ear, which the most gifted angel could not satisfy. The church, too, by such an exertion for day and night so long, must rest for months, if not years to come, to recruit both their physical and spiritual resources. But as they lay down their armor, stay at home, and begin to take their rest, the meetings fail in numbers and interest, till very soon all are discouraged, and only complain that 'things are not as in days that are past and gone.' Then follows the work of discipline—scores are found in the church who are not of it, who are the same as before they entered it, and who, for the honor of the cause, must be put out of it. Another effect is, the disgust of the whole affair, which overspreads the impenitent of the congregation, and the community at large. A current here at once begins to form from different streams, setting in upon the church with an increasing violence, which they in their exhausted state cannot resist. Besides all this, a church in this state rests on no foundation—they are mere creatures of impulse, always upon 'the go' after something novel and curious, and are carried off with every 'lo here, and lo there,' which floats along—and this is our very condition this very day, as churches all over the country. We are prostrate, lifeless, and struggling for the breath of life, because worn out with over-action, distracted by 'isms,' weary from discipline, and lost of our influence over the impenitent, who care not to attend so much as a prayer-meeting. These are the facts in the case, and exist from this very cause, and there is not a discerning man among us that can deny it."

The remedies for the present deplorable state of things, which the letter suggests, are, 1. Repentance, including not only sorrow for the wrong under consideration, but a determination to reform, and repeat no more the same things. 2. A strict, thorough, and impartial course of discipline in the church, without fear, impatience, or discouragement. 3. A constant effort, by pastor and people, to maintain a revival of religion—not as a thing to be enjoyed once in two or four years, but all the time, as the result of exertions daily put forth in connection with the labors of the regular ministry.

ACTIVE BENEVOLENCE AND ENJOYMENT.

We cannot agree with Dr. Young, that "it is impious in a good man to be sad, though we are satisfied that much of his sadness might often be easily banished.

One mode of doing this is active benevolence. "Assurance," says President Edwards, "is not to be obtained so much by self-examination as by action;" and the assertion is equally true of Christian enjoyment, which flows from this assurance.

This was the course adopted by Howard. His rule for shaking off trouble was, "Set about doing good; put on your hat and go and visit the sick and the poor in the neighborhood, inquire into their wants, and minister to them; seek out the desolate and the oppressed, and tell them of the consolations of religion. I have often tried this method," he adds, "and have always found it the best medicine for a heavy heart."

The prescription is a good one; and others, as well as Howard, may find a remedy for trouble in active benevolence. This will dissipate that sickly and morbid sensibility which broods in secret sadness over real or imaginary sorrows, which so often obscures the brightness of the good man's days, and shuts out from his soul the cheering light of heaven. This, if in vigorous exercise, will leave him no time for the indulgence of gloomy reveries and desponding forebodings. This will multiply his positive pleasures, and will sweeten them all with that joy that flows from the thought that he has rendered others happy. This, by its very exercise, will afford him more and more of that evidence of piety which is found in the zealous and faithful discharge of duty, and thus will increase his enjoyment. This, in short, if performed in a right spirit, is active holiness, with which, in the economy of Providence, happiness is ever connected.

"DAYS OF OLD."

THE FREE-WILL OFFERING.

The house of Merab was very poor in Goshen: there was not found in his dwelling gold or silver or precious stones; neither blue nor purple nor scarlet nor fine linen; neither fragrant oils nor spices. Of the great wealth that Abraham possessed, of the substance that Jacob had brought down into Egypt, of the immense treasures over which Joseph held command, nothing remained to Israel, save in some few instances, perhaps, where a wreck or two of what had been his father's was secreted by some trembling bondsman, not for the intrinsic value of the thing, but because of the dear and sacred associations connected with it. Often, too, was such cherished memento of former days wrested away by the hand of rapacious violence accidentally discovering it; and still more frequently had it been relinquished to satisfy the cravings of a sick neighbor after some comparative delicacy beyond the reach of his own poverty. Herds there were, and flocks in Goshen, but of these Merab possessed none; and strange indeed would the prediction have sounded in the ears of Israel, had a prophet been commissioned to announce to them that ere many days had passed they should be called on to contribute in rich profusion all precious metals, all costly fabrics, all odoriferous spices, and to rear from their own stores a pile of splendid gifts, dazzling to the beholders' eyes, and so abundant as to require an express command to cease from pouring them upon the gorgeous heap.

"How little I regarded this!" said Jabin, while polishing with a soft piece of skin a jewel of great value; "how contemptible did it appear in my sight, when it was flung by the Egyptian maiden into the package that I hastily rolled up! I had, indeed, rejected it, but for the command given to ask of our neighbors what they were then no less eager to give than before they were niggardly in withholding. They who spoiled us became a spoil; and thus are we, even amongst the least and poorest in Israel, enabled to offer unto the Eternal, one of the most brilliant jewels in the camp."

"The daughters of Thebes walked proudly past me," said Merab's wife; "and many a costly trinket of fine workmanship danced and flashed beneath the sunbeam as they tossed the scornful head, nor deigned aught but a glance of exulting pity, when a sort of suspicious fear oft seemed to mingle with their high disdain, upon the maidens and matrons of Israel. They were hateful to look upon, those heartless oppressors of our race."

"Nay, dearest mother, reproach them not now; remember the tears of woe, the bitter wail of anguish wrung from them, when every mother saw her first-born, whether in bold bright manhood or in unconscious infancy, stiffening before her in the ghastliness of death. Think, too, of what we saw not, but what surely must have been the scene, when tidings reached them of the overwhelming destruction of Egypt's mighty host, piled in heaps of corrupting loathsomeness on the shores of the Red Sea, even before the temple of their helpless gods. Great were the enemies of Egypt: terrible the vengeance of the Most Holy: the full cup of His wrath emptied on their sinful heads! We will not exult, mother; but we will glorify the Eternal our God, who brought us forth laden with great spoil, which thus He vouchsafes to accept at our hands for His own service. A free-will offering of that which He gave unto us."

"I have an offering," said Merab, in a voice of the deepest emotion: "thinkest thou, my boy, that I may dare to lay it before the Lord? See, Jabin, this broken ear-ring; when the shout arose in the camp for every Israelite to bring to Aaron the golden ring from his ears, I hastened to unloose it, with the same guilty purpose; and in so doing I wrested the fastening as thou seest. Thine agony, Jabin, thy prostrate frame barring egress from the tent door save by trampling on it; thy cries of warning, of supplication, of certain vengeance, on the guilty, appalled me, and withheld my step. I could replace the ring, but I have kept it hidden in my bosom, a memorial of my desperate wickedness against the Most High. O say, thinkest thou He will receive it at my hand? May one so guilty, but for thee more guilty still, dare to approach with such a free-will-offering in his hand?" And as he spake the tears burst forth abundantly, bathing the golden ring that his trembling fingers held towards his son. Jabin was at his feet in a moment: "My father," he said, as he reverently kissed the drops from that penitent's hand, "there is no gem so bright in yonder treasury as the tear of him who mourns over a transgression, because he feels against how much love and mercy his sin is committed. Thou, my father, had it but in thine heart so to transgress: not I, but the God of Israel restrained thee. More precious will that little hoop of gold be among the free-will-offerings than this costly jewel; for the oppression of sin is worse than the oppression of Egypt: and the spoil that He, the Eternal, enabled thee to take from thyself, in the hour of temptation, is greater than the spoil wherewith we spoiled the terrified Egyptians. Yea, it will be accepted: delay not to approach, praising our glorious Deliverer."

The eye might scarcely dwell upon that heap of brilliancy and beauty, the price of a nation's ransom, that lay in bright confusion around the meek and placid Leader, who superintended the distribution of the gifts, each in his own department. When Jabin placed the Theban jewel before him, its surpassing lustre attracted every eye: the small circlet of broken gold that his companion dropped beside it, attracted little notice from man; but oh! the calm that shed its influence into every recess of Merab's penitent and thankful heart, while he felt that the fee-will-offering of his hand was accepted, where, but for the restraining mercy of the Eternal, the forfeiture of his streaming life-blood had then been exacted!

LORD ELDON'S FULFILMENT OF A PROMISE.

In 1783, when Mr. Scott, afterwards Lord Eldon, first became a candidate for the borough of Weobly, he was received and lodged in the house of Mr. Bridge, the vicar, who, having a daughter then a young child, took a jocular promise from him, that if he should ever become a chancellor, and the little girl's husband should be a clergyman, the chancellor would give that clergyman a living. Now comes the sequel, partly related by Lord Eldon himself to his niece, Mrs. Foster:

"Years rolled on; I came into office, when one morning, I was told a young lady wished to speak to me; and I said young ladies must be attended to, so they must show her up. And up came a very pretty young lady, and curtsied and simpered and said she thought I could not recollect her. I answered I certainly could not, but perhaps she could recall herself to my memory. So she asked if I remembered the clergyman at Weobly, and his little girl to whom I had made a promise.

"Oh, yes!" I said, "I do; and I suppose you are the little girl!"

She curtsied, and said, "Yes."

"And I suppose you are married to a clergyman?"

"No," she said, and she blushed; "I am only going to be married to one, if you, my lord, will give him a living."

"Well, I told her to come back in a few days; and I made inquiries to ascertain from the bishop of the dioccss that the gentleman she was going to be married to was a respectable clergyman of the Church of England; and then I looked at my list and I found I actually had a living vacant that I could give him. So, when the young lady came back, I told her she might return home and get married as fast as she liked, for her intended husband should be presented to a living, and I would send the papers as soon as they could be made out."

"Oh, no!" she exclaimed, and again she simpered, and blushed and curtsied; "pray, my lord, let me take them back myself."

"I was a good deal amused, so I actually had the papers made out, and I signed them, and she took them back herself the following day."

DEFENCE AGAINST FEAR.

I know of but one way, (said Addison,) to fortify myself against gloomy presages and terrors of mind—and that is, by securing to myself the friendship and protection of that Being who disposes of events, and governs futurity. He sees, at one view, the whole thread of my existence—not only that part of it which I have already passed through, but that which runs forward into the depths of eternity. When I lay me down to sleep, I recommend myself to His care; when I awake, I give myself up to His direction. Amidst all the evils that threaten me, I will look up to Him for help, and question not but He will avert them, or turn them to my advantage. Though I know neither the time nor the manner of the death that I am to die, I am not at all solicitous about it; because I am sure that He knows them both, and that He will not fail to comfort and support me under them.

THAT THOUGHT IS DONE.

We were exceedingly amused, and not a little astonished recently, in looking over a communication from a Sandwich Island youth to his benefactor in this country. He writes a sentence, and adds, "This thought is done." He writes another, upon another point, and adds again, "This thought is done." We are amused at the simplicity of the expression, and astonished at the greatness of the discovery. That a discovery which seems to have eluded the great majority of educated and disciplined minds in this enlightened land, should be thus made by one just emerging from a state of barbarism, is indeed astonishing. Were all who speak in public, especially all who occupy the pulpit, to make the discovery on their own productions—to perceive instinctively, and say to themselves at the right spot, This thought is done, and stop hammering upon it, turning it about and fumbling it over, but pass to something else, the relief of those who hear would be unspeakably great; it would be somewhat like removing mountains from their shoulders.

PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS.

The German Frankfort Journal contains the following paragraph:

"Notwithstanding the applications made in favor of the Israelite inhabitants of the frontiers of Russia and Poland, the transportation of that unhappy population has been irrevocably decided, as the only means of maintaining the system of exclusion and the laws which protect it. One hundred thousand Israelites come under that measure. The rich Israelites, it is true, have been authorized to dispose of their property, and to fix their residence wherever they please. This was considered a favor, but it is a mere illusion. The Israelites, being compelled to alienate their property, will not be able to sell it to advantage; and, on the other hand, they are only permitted to settle in the governments that formed part of the kingdom of Poland at the period of the first partition. Now, the Israelite population is so numerous in those governments, that the new comers will find it difficult to earn a livelihood in competition with their co-religionists. As regards the property belonging to Israelites in less affluent circumstances, the Government will take it on an estimation, but will give so small a price for it, that it will be scarcely adequate to defray the expenses of their new establishment. The country, besides, assigned to the Israelites for a residence, is not only almost uninhabited, but is so barren that the produce of the soil will scarcely pay the expenses of cultivation."

A book was printed during the time of Cromwell, with the following title:—Eggs of Charity, layed by the Chickens of the Covenant, and boiled with the water of Divine Love—Take ye and eat."

The Sabbath Recorder.

NEW YORK, NOV. 14, 1844.

INDIVIDUAL EFFORT.

In the New Testament, the greatest importance is attached to individual effort, and the richest promises are connected with it. It was not in great companies that our Saviour sent forth his disciples, but they went two and two. It was where two or three were assembled in his name, rather than in the great congregations, that he promised his especial presence. So must it be always. Men are to be converted from their sins and errors only through a personal application of the truth. This personal application may indeed be made in large assemblies, and often has been; but oftener, where the individual is set free from observation, and his attention is left undivided, "a word fitly spoken" will reach the heart, and lead to a thorough reformation of life. Multiplied are the illustrations of this truth which might be given. On one occasion a tract-visitor left one of his silent messengers, accompanied by a few words of advice, with a profane sailor. That sailor thought of the words which had been spoken, and studied the truths of that tract, until he acknowledged his danger, and found peace in believing upon Christ. He visited his former home soon afterwards, where he spoke and read to his neighbors about the truths of religion, until a general interest was awakened, and several persons converted to God. The final result was, that an entire change was produced in a community where there had before been no church, and all was a moral waste. The whole region was renovated in its mechanical and intellectual, as well as its religious aspects. Churches and school-houses, preaching and instruction, are now to be seen and enjoyed, where all was darkness but a short time ago. And this happy change resulted from the benevolent efforts of one individual. With such facts before us, who will refuse to put forth his exertions?

THE ARGUMENT FROM GOD'S BLESSING.

Nothing is more common, than to hear the correctness of one's doctrines, argued from the blessing which has attended his labors. This mode of reasoning has been adopted especially by some branches of the Protestant church in this country; by it the Pedobaptist supposes that the baptism of children is abundantly sustained; the Methodist, that the correctness of Arminianism is triumphantly proved; and all denominations, that the observance of Sunday is sufficiently sanctioned. It would not be surprising, after Protestants have set the example, if Catholics should bring their claims to this test; and they have done it in such a form as to demand an answer. Dr. Wiseman, one of the first scholars in the Catholic church, has recently framed an argument in favor of his church, from the great blessing which has attended its missionary labors. He asserts, that while the converts by Protestant missions—with one or two exceptions, such as at the Sandwich Islands—have been but a handful, the converts by Catholic missions have numbered thousands, and that notwithstanding the Catholic contributions have been less than those of Protestants. Now, if the ground usually taken in such arguments be good, viz., that God's blessing upon a man proves his doctrines to be sound, then we see not how those who use the argument can reply to the Doctor. For our own part, we think the facts spoken of can be very easily explained, by a reference to the character of Catholic missionaries and Catholic conversions. Those missionaries have generally been well chosen for their work—sagacious, resolute, persevering men. They have gone forth among the heathen with an imposing and attractive form of religious worship. Such a form, in the hands of such men, has secured many admirers and professed converts. This, to a candid and discerning mind, would at once explain the great fact out of which Dr. Wiseman makes so much. In nearly every argument of the kind, a little observation would enable us to discover, that it rests upon a false and presumptive interpretation of the facts. And if we allow of this mode of arguing, and carry it out to its legitimate results, we shall find ourselves approving and disapproving the same doctrine at different times, or even at the same time in different places. We think, therefore, that a disputed question, which needs the support of the argument from what is imagined to be God's blessing, had better be given up at once.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.

This Society derives its support mainly from the Congregational, Episcopal, Baptist, Reformed Dutch, and Presbyterian churches; and it has, therefore, a Publishing Committee comprising a representative of each of these churches. It is a general principle of the Society, to publish nothing without the sanction of this Committee; hence it has been found necessary to modify expressions in many of the books which the Society has issued, so as to make the authors speak the language of the Committee. But this censorship has been so discreetly used for the most part, as to prevent any serious collision. The Society has recently published an edition of D'Aubigne's History of the Reformation, however, in which the alterations are of such a character as to excite the fears of the Presbyterians, and call forth a remonstrance from them. A Committee, appointed by the New York and New Jersey Synod, has published a long article exposing these alterations, or mutilations, as they are called, and modestly demanding, that in future, the Society shall publish its books entire, if at all.

In looking over the objections of the Committee of the Synod, we find that they relate chiefly to Episcopacy and Baptism. In regard to Episcopacy, they state that the alterations and abridgements are such as to favor it, and to allow of a lofty head being "uplifted from the midst of the apostles and teachers." In regard to Baptism, they charge the alterations with suppressing historical facts unfavorable to the old Anabaptists; suppressing the fact that Luther was baptized in infancy; and omitting things said by some of the Reformers against the "new baptism," or immersion. This they say is done, while the following language is allowed to remain: "The baptism of infants is a horrible abomination—a flagrant impiety, invented by the evil spirit and by Pope Nicholas II."

Such is the Society's offence—an offence which has called forth much feeling and a severe rebuke. We wish the Society was guilty of no greater sin. But we can not, while our attention is called to this subject, overlook the fact, that upon other points, and particularly upon the subject of the Sabbath, the Society has given currency to works which even more palpably contradict the facts than does this. Witness its tract on the "Institution and Observance of the Sabbath," in which it is asserted, that "the whole current of ecclesiastical history shows that it has been the constant and uninterrupted practice of the church throughout the world, since the days of the Apostles, to observe the first day of the week as the true Sabbath." A more flagrant falsification of history could hardly be made. We do not call attention to it, however, for the sake of creating prejudice or arousing feeling. We believe the Society has been useful, and may therefore deserve support. But we believe, nevertheless, that the only way to continue its usefulness and its support, is by either restricting its publications to subjects about which there is no difference, or, when it publishes upon other subjects, taking care that those publications speak the truth, without reference to the greatness or smallness of the number who may differ from them. As a means of calling attention to the subject, we are glad that their edition of D'Aubigne's History has been examined and reviewed.

HAS THE QUESTION BEEN SETTLED?

THE TRUE WESLEYAN.

The following extract is taken from an article on the "Observance of the Sabbath," written by S. Worsley, of Hebron, Conn., and published in a late number of the True Wesleyan, a paper issued from Boston for the Wesleyan Methodist Connection of America:

> "I presume it to be absolutely useless to enter into any argument proving the 1st day of the week to be divinely appointed as the Christian Sabbath, that question having been long since settled in the minds of all pious, sensible men. Neither do I think it necessary to attempt to prove it to be obligatory on Christians to observe the first day of the week, or Christian Sabbath, as a holy day; that question I consider, too, to be settled generally. And now what I have to do, is to offer a few brief remarks showing how the Sabbath ought to be observed as a holy day."

This extract makes assertions which are sometimes heard in conversation, but which only a few men have been sufficiently reckless of truth to make in writing. There are four positions taken here, either directly or by necessary inference, which we shall take the liberty, without qualification, to deny.

1. We deny, that the first day of the week has been "divinely appointed as the Christian Sabbath."

2. We deny, that this question has "been long since settled in the minds of all pious, sensible men."

3. We deny, that it can be proved from Scripture, "to be obligatory on Christians to observe the first day of the week, or Christian Sabbath, as a holy day."

4. We deny, that this question has been, in any proper sense of those terms, "settled generally."

We presume it will be allowed, that a candid reader of the extract from the Wesleyan, would understand it as affirming each of the positions we have denied. Of course such a person, if our views be correct, would be led into error by the perusal of the article. We call upon the writer, therefore, as a religious teacher, or upon the editor of the Wesleyan as one who gives currency to his teachings, either to prove the positions taken in that article, or to counteract their injurious effects by acknowledging their unsoundness. Will he do it? We wait to see.

MUSIC IN SWITZERLAND.

A musical revolution is going on in Switzerland, the object of which is to give a new direction to popular singing. It commenced with a number of students, who endeavored to introduce patriotic songs among the people in place of the coarse and vulgar ballads which were so common. The religious awakening, which was making daily progress in Switzerland, came to their aid, and did much to improve the national singing. But the movement was not complete until a gentleman, M. Kaupert, proposed to teach gratuitously the whole population of young and willing persons in any village to sing together. This proposition was accepted in many places; he commenced his instructions, and they had extended from one neighborhood to another, producing a social and moral effect which excites the astonishment of the whole country. Hymns in praise of God, and songs in honor of their country, all free from every moral taint, have awakened an unprecedented enthusiasm, and served to cultivate some of the noblest feelings. The following is a specimen of the effect of M. Kaupert's labors—labors for which he is now receiving the highest marks of honor:

> "At Lausanne his instructions were sought with universal avidity. Many who had been accustomed to spend their evenings in dissipation, began to employ them entirely in learning the new method. Children and their parents, all the schools, the professors and students of the college, servants and mistresses, workmen and masters, persons who had been the most opposed to each other in religion and politics—the inhabitants of different villages distinguished by banners—all were attracted, all seemed of one heart and soul. When the previous training was complete, a day was fixed for the grand concert. More than 2,000 singers were arranged in the great church, the noblest Gothic building in Switzerland: the flags of villages and societies were tastefully disposed on an ivy-clad tower; the vast multitude who came to hear were crowded within and without; and then was sung a hymn, to an air of Luther's composing, simple, grave, noble, but oh! the effect!—no words can utter it; the impression will never be forgotten."

MISSIONARY JUBILEE.

It was in the London Missionary Society, that the spirit of missions was first embodied on a large scale. Its formation gave an impulse and direction to the exertions of Protestants in various countries and denominations. It was fitting, therefore, that the fiftieth year of the existence of that Society should be celebrated, as it was, during the last week of September, in the different towns throughout England. The great meeting was in London, where the venerable William Jay, one of the fathers of the society, now in his seventy-sixth year, preached for nearly two hours, without exhausting his own strength or diminishing the attention of his auditory. In the evening, addresses were made by the representatives of the six leading evangelical denominations, and the occasion is spoken of as one of very great interest. The collections made at the different meetings throughout the country were large; the resolutions passed were of a stirring character, and the whole jubilant celebration was one long to be remembered.

OBSERVATIONS OF A TOURIST—NO. 1.

For the Recorder.

Having been interrupted in the preparation of my "Thoughts on the Perpetuity of the Sabbath," by a tour of several weeks, I propose, before resuming and completing them, to offer a few of my observations while passing along. My business has been chiefly among our own people, and with them I shall begin. Being a comparative stranger among them, my observations are, many of them, the result of the first impressions a person receives on comparing new things with things of familiar acquaintance. These are some times very incorrect or superficial; but when one finds them repeated in different places and positions, he feels confirmed in the opinion that he has formed respecting them; and when they are of public importance, he may offer them with confidence to his friends; for he has accumulated evidences to sustain them.

The first of these observations, which is of public concern, is made with no censorious spirit, for it occurred to me in connection with the highest esteem for the virtues with which it is accompanied. As a general thing, I am persuaded that the observers of the Sabbath too much underrate themselves. It is right, and we have occasion enough, to esteem ourselves small; but we ought not to be insensible to the blessings or advantages that Providence spreads before us. Many of our people—most of those descended from the ancient Sabbath-keeping families of our land—speak of the denomination as being poor, poorer than other denominations of professing Christians; and I presume they really think it is so. But from an extensive acquaintance with other people, and what I have now seen of Sabbath-keepers, I am prepared to say, confidently, that it is not so. As a class of citizens, they are on an average in as good circumstances as any class of our fellow-citizens following the same occupations; and all praise and gratitude is due to the Great Author of all our mercies, who blessed the Sabbath day, that he takes care to bless also the labor of those who remember his Sabbath to keep it. And this gratitude ought to be shown, not alone in the praises of the family altar and the sanctuary, but by a liberal hand, by speaking well of his service before our children, and before our fellow-citizens, many of whom really imagine that to embrace the Sabbath is necessarily attended with voluntary exile from good society, and sitting down in confirmed poverty. This is a great mistake, and mischievous in its influence. It costs no more to observe the seventh day than to observe the first; and if there be any position in life that more than another may lead a man confidently to expect the blessing of God upon his labor, it is to be found in keeping the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Like Abraham of old, and the primitive Christians, a Sabbath-keeper may sometimes be called to leave all for his obedience and faith; but let him go, nothing doubting but that he who said, "In blessing I will bless THEE," and he who said, "He that forsaketh father and mother, and houses and lands, for my sake, shall find an hundred fold more in this life, and in the world to come life everlasting," will yet bountifully provide for those who fear and obey him. Why Sabbath-keeping, above keeping any other of God's commands, should be attended with poverty, I cannot see any reason for whatever. Nor is it so with respect to the Sabbath-keepers of this country.

Neither does it necessarily follow, that a man must be banished from good society because he keeps God's holy Sabbath day, and pursues his occupations on the first day of the week. If any such retire from their fellow-citizens on that account, it is their own fault; their fellow-citizens will not expect it from them, if they stand up and with manly piety defend their own course in keeping the commands of the ever-living God. None but bigots will despise them on that account, and bigotry is disreputable in this country though sometimes indulged. Sabbath-keeping is as honorable and as defensible as honesty and chastity; and every honorable station in our land is as accessible to them as to the observers of the first day. It is not necessary to go into a corner to be a consistent Sabbath-keeper. I have found some Sabbath-keepers among the very best, and among the most successful merchants, mechanics, manufacturers, physicians, judges, legislators, both in assembly and senate, and am told they have filled the Governor's chair. Their intelligence and general education, I am sure, is equal to that of any denomination of their fellow-Christians filling the same stations in society. The ministry, whatever it may have been in times past, is now equal for pious, sound, common-sense men in their vocation, to the ministry of the most successful denominations in our land; and if a mutual understanding and a thorough organization were secured, they might become as efficient.

I write not these things to flatter my brethren with self-sufficiency, but to give glory to the ever-living God, who keepeth covenant and mercy to a thousand generations with them that fear him and remember his commandments to do them; and to say to him that is of a doubtful mind, Be strong, and to him that is feeble and ready to faint, Fear not, for Jehovah has said, "Him that honoreth me will I honor." Who is he that despiseth the Lord's people when they are few? S. D.

THE TRACT CAUSE.

For the Recorder.

On seeing in a late number of the Recorder an abstract of the Report of the Board of Directors of the American Sabbath Tract Society, I thought this to be a proper time for me to say a word or two to my brethren who feel an interest in the Tract Cause. And to begin, brethren, I will say to you, that there is a way in which you may act efficiently in this cause. If you will make yourselves members of the society, by putting into its treasury the money required by the Constitution for that purpose, you will in that way collect the funds needed, and establish a society which will have the ability to conduct the tract publishing business to general advantage and satisfaction. Brethren, will you do it? You can, any one of you, enter directly into the work. Just write a subscription paper, stating that the undersigned, wishing to become members of the American Sabbath Tract Society, pay or have paid the sums specified by them in their subscription, for that purpose. When you have got the subscription prepared, enter your own name first on the list; then circulate the same, and solicit others to do likewise. When all has been done that can be in this way, send the money to the Treasurer, and the list of members' names to the Secretary, and he will keep a record of the same. In this way all will be easily understood, and the effect will be salutary. I would not be understood to prescribe the method to be followed, but suggest that something more must be done than to have local Tract Societies, or take collections for the tract cause. We must either incorporate ourselves into a general society, so far as to make that an efficient body, and do away the necessity of our brethren in New York City keeping up an organization for the publication of tracts, or else we should abandon the idea of a General Society, and carry on our tract enterprise through the New York Sabbath Tract Society, or some other brethren, as a Board of Managers appointed for that purpose. I will here add my opinion, that if the brethren would take hold, (and I trust they will,) and make the general society what it might and ought to be, it would be the best means or instrument by which to effect the object in view. But if the brethren will not do that, it would appear that they ought to consider in the most favorable light the efforts and enterprise of individuals engaged in the tract cause, and assist and advise with them, that the good sought to be done may be accomplished.

I wish further to say, that it is desirable that the tract society should be enabled to publish some articles which have been recommended to it for that purpose. One is an Address read before the Conference at its last session, a notice of which will be found in the minutes of that body. Another is the work of Carlow on the subject of the Sabbath. Besides these, there will be others well worthy of publication, if the means necessary to publish them can be obtained.

Brethren, we must go on. We can not depend upon the sale of our tracts to enable us to publish others. The truth they contain is too unwelcome to the public mind to admit of their sale to any considerable extent. In this respect, though the Christian public is very backward in obeying that Scripture which says, "Buy the truth," yet they approach very near to a fulfillment of that which says, "Sell it not," for notwithstanding our publications have been advertised extensively, and put into the hands or shops of prominent booksellers, yet they have made no sales, or next to none. DESTITUTION OF MINISTERS AT THE WEST.

Some persons who are aware how many preachers have gone to the West, have expressed their surprise at the loud calls for ministerial help in that region. The following extract of a letter from Rev. Philander Taylor will perhaps modify their surprise. No places stand in greater need of ministerial labor than do some in which men are found who have licences to preach, and have even been ordained to that work.

> "I have heard much of the destitution of ministers in this country, and presume it is really so; but if the remark applies to the number of men known as such, it is not true. In this sense there are plenty of them, more than is needed, and some of them could be spared for New York, for they are of no manner of use here as ministers. I have more or less of them in my congregation every time I preach. The first Sunday I preached there were four of them present. Men who are willing to neglect their ministerial duties, or can be tempted to engage in worldly business, would do better to stay in the old States. But if the remark is used concerning self-denying, faithful ministers, of such we are greatly in need, and such cannot suffer here—they will do well."

"NATIONAL LORD'S DAY CONVENTION."—This Convention is to be held at Baltimore on the 27th inst. A large attendance is expected from all parts of the Union. Brethren Nathan V. Hull and Thomas B. Brown have been appointed delegates to the Convention, both by the American Sabbath Tract Society, and by the Committee chosen at the last General Conference for the purpose of making arrangements for Sabbath Conventions, &c. It is expected that they will be present.

PROGRESS OF TEMPERANCE.—The temperance cause is making rapid and sure progress in almost every part of the world. A society has been formed in Netherlands, which has issued several tracts and other publications on the subject, and is carrying forward its efforts in a very zealous and commendable spirit. In the West Indies, particularly Jamaica, considerable is doing by the circulation of books and holding of meetings. Buenos Ayres has also a flourishing temperance Society. Father Mathew is still at work in Ireland, gathering up those that remain under the influence of intemperate habits. In England, temperance meetings are multiplying, and are well attended. There is much, therefore, to encourage the friends of this good cause.

PERSECUTION IN NORWAY.—A body of Quakers living at Storenger, Norway, have appealed to the government for relief from the persecutions which they are enduring on account of their religious faith. They are said to have been imprisoned for weeks, and subjected to many other vexations and wrongs, because they would not bring their children to baptism. This comes from the Lutheran church of Norway, which a few years ago expressed so much sympathy for the persecuted Lutherans of Prussia.

A VOICE FROM PRISON.—Our readers will remember the account which we gave of the trial and imprisonment of the Abbe Maurette, in France. The following extract of a letter, written by him to a friend, will show with what spirit he endures his confinement:

> "Beloved and honored brother in Christ: I am a prisoner; and God grant I may be able to say, in all the meaning of the term, with St. Paul in the Ephesians, 'I am a prisoner for Jesus Christ.' But though I am in prison, I have not seen, like Paul, the tribune commanding them to beat me, nor have I seen Paul's chains. And though they should come to me with them, though they should visit me with the saw and the sword, would God refuse to me that which he has granted to so many others, namely, the grace, the power, the privilege of changing this poor life for a better in the resurrection? Oh no! I am full of confidence in him."

DR. JOSEPH WOLF.—This gentleman, who left England some time since, for the purpose of ransoming two officers who were enslaved in Bokhara, has found that the objects of his solicitude were murdered before his departure, and has himself fallen among thieves. A letter from him states that he is a prisoner, and in the greatest danger. Promises of heavy rewards, on condition of his liberation, have been extorted from him by those whom he suspects to have been the cause of the murder of the officers; and he therefore asks for all the assistance which can be rendered to him consistently with the honor of England. In an address to "all the monarchs of Europe," he says: "I do not know whether this blood of mine shall be spilt. I do not supplicate for my own safety, but monarchs! 200,000 Persian slaves, many of them people of high talent, sigh in the kingdom of Bokhara; endeavor to effect their liberation, and I shall rejoice in the grave that my blood has been the cause of the ransom of so many human beings!"

Since the above was in type, we learn from the Boston Transcript, on the authority of a letter from Constantinople of Sept. 7, that Dr. Wolf has been released by the Khan of Bokhara, and was daily expected at the Persian frontier.

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—Some idea of the hold which the Free Church has upon the hearts of the Scotch people, may be obtained from its collections during the present year. The amount collected for the sustentation fund was £62,468; for the building fund, £227,836; congregational funds, £31,540; for missions, £31,790. If to this be added what has been subscribed for schools, the aggregate will be somewhat over £400,000, or near $2,000,000. This speaks well for the voluntary principle.

MRS. TORREY, wife of Rev. Charles T. Torrey, now awaiting his trial in the Baltimore jail for aiding the escape of slaves, is now in that city, and has visited her husband in his confinement. She is to await the result of his trial.

REV. DR. NELSON, known as the founder of the Mission Institute, and author of several valuable religious works, died recently at his residence near Quincy, Illinois.

MRS. MARY E. VAN LENNEP, the wife of Rev. Henry J. Van Lennep, missionary to Constantinople, died at that place on the 27th of September. She was a daughter of Rev. Dr. Hawes, of Hartford, Ct.

"DEFENCE OF ELDER HIMES."—We have received three or four copies of a long article under this head, in which Eld. Joshua V. Himes proves, by facts and affidavits, that the charge against him of having received and appropriated to his own use large sums of money contributed by certain Millerites, is a base calumny set afloat for an evil purpose. We have never either believed or published the charges, and need not be expected, therefore, to publish a refutation of them.

The Govenor of Maine has appointed Thursday the 5th of December to be observed as a day of Thanksgiving throughout the State.

General Intelligence.

THE SOCIETY ISLANDS.

By a late arrival at New Bedford, the report of another battle between the French and the Natives of Tahiti, is confirmed.

On the 20th of June, the natives assembled at Point Venus, when the Governor, again at the head of four hundred troops, marched upon them. The natives received intelligence of his approach, and placed themsslves in ambush. The natives allowed the main body to pass, but as the rear guard were passing in front of the English Mission House, they opened their fire in a direct line with the house. Mr. McKean, one of the missionaries, who was walking his verandah, was struck by a ball and killed instantly. His death is universally regretted. He was one of those who have lately come from England—well educated, and one of the most respected men of the group. The action was upon the north side of the Bay of Papeite. The native loss is unknown. French loss, three killed and five wounded.

At the same time, on the south side, another action took place, in which the natives were again routed. In this action, five French were killed aud seven wounded. Native loss unknown.

The day following, the natives again advanced upon the town, and before they could be met, had succeeded in burning the French Mission House, Chapel, &c.

In all these actions, it has been impossible to determine with any degree of certainty the native loss. They have always been accustomed to remove their dead during the action, and only those are found upon the field, who die at the point of the bayonet.

The natives are in force on all sides, and the troops constantly under arms. The Queen had just left the Island for Borabora.

The natives had within the last few days seized three Frenchmen, who had been for many years resident upon the island, and were among them; and had just put them to death by torture that would do credit to the ingenuity of a North American savage.

Late from Chili.—We have news from Valparaiso to the 10th of August. On the 4th of July the American citizens there celebrated the Anniversary of our National Independence with much spirit.—An extensive conflagration occurred on the 8th of July, by which damage was done to the amount of $60,000. Bulnes is still President of Chili, and his administration has been attended with much success. Peace has been perfectly preserved, since he came into office. He is liked very much, and the expireation of his term will be regretted by all. A new port has been opened on the Island of Chiloe, called San Miguel. The increased call for timber is such that a large number of vessels are constantly in waiting for cargoes, at San Carlos, and the government have, therefore, deemed it expedient to open a new port. On the 19th July there was at Valparaiso, a smart shock of an earthquake, which lasted a few seconds.

Late from the Coast of Africa.—By an arrival at New York on Sunday last, the following intelligence has been received:

There appears to have been a quarrel between the natives and Portuguese at Brissat. The barque Imogene, Capt. Williams, had been chartered by the Portuguese Governor to go to the river Gambia for aid. The quarrel had arisen from a dispute between some soldiers and the natives, which resulted in the death of a native. That evening the natives attacked the town and fort, and partly plundered the former. When Capt. Williams sailed from Bissao, the principal merchants had removed the greater part of their goods on board the vessels there, and on a neighboring island. The natives had full possession of the town. The Governor at Gambia was not able to furnish any troops on account of sickness among the officers of the garrison.

Thrilling Incident.—At a meeting of the friends of Colonization in this city, on Wednesday evening, we were spectators to one of the most intensely thrilling incidents connected with the departure of a small band of emigrants, just brought to the city by a gentleman of Shelby county, by whom they were manumitted, and placed under the care of Rev. Mr. Pinny, an agent of the Colonization Society. Of the number, eleven were children of one man, who was present, and appeared to be verging to the age of three score years and ten. This patriarch was not of the number manumitted; he belonged to another estate, but had permission to accompany his wife and children to this city, and here bid them a final adieu. When this fact was announced, with an emotion that almost choked the utterance of the speaker, there was that long drawing in of the breath by every listener, which indicates the workings of the powers within. All eyes were directed toward the object of so much sympathy; and when it was farther stated, that the owner of the old man Reuben, (for so he was called) would permit him to depart with his family for the small sum of a thousand pence, the response was with one voice, Reuben shall be free! On that instant the table of the Moderator was thronged, and the requisite sum laid upon it; to reunite for the remnant of their days, old man Reuben and his wife; and they and their children are now on their way to the shores of Africa. [Louis. Cour.

Abandoned in a Desert.—The English brig Amity, Capt. J. C. Hogue, sailed from London on the 7th of May last, bound to Tajoura, a port in the Red Sea, and arrived on the 23d June in sight of the Islands of Trinidad, near the coast of Brazil: and as it was calm, the master landed on one of the Islands to verify the chronometer, and to shoot. In attempting to regain the vessel, the boat was upset in the surf, broken to pieces, and a sailor drowned. Thus deprived of means to retnrn to his vessel, the master was compelled to continue upon the island with three sailors. The Amity was in sight during two days, but the mate made no attempt to succor them, and she afterwards disappeared in the horizon, thus abandoning them on a desert island. They remained there for twenty-three days, sustaining themselves on shell fish until the 16th of July, when they were rescued from their painful situation by the American ship Brandt, which brought them to Rio de Janeiro.

Indian Possessions.—The Ottoes own, at the latest accounts, a large tract of country on the Big Platte, west of the Missouri; they are a poor race of people, and receive a small annuity of $2500. The Pawnees are a powerful body, and number about 6500 persons, divided into bands under the names of Pawnee-Loups, Grand Pawnees, Republican Pawnees, Pawnee-Pics, &c.; they are wild and fugitive in their habits, and receive provisions and goods. The Grand Nation is the Pottowattomies, or the "united bands of the Chippewas, Ottowas and Pottowattomies." They own five millions of acres of prairie lands, along the Missouri river to the Little Sioux, number about 2000, and receive $42,000 a year for their lands sold in Illinois and Michigan. They are a respectable body of Indians, are good farmers, and educate their children. The payment of the annuities si always a season of great hilarity and festivity.

American Bible Society.—At a monthly meeting of the Board of Managers of this institution, held Thursday evening, the general agent reported that the issues of copies of the Holy Scriptures during the month of October have been larger than in any month since the formation of the Society. The number sent out from the Bible House is 47,442, of which 15,326 were Bibles, 32,102 Testaments, and 14 copies of the Scriptures for the blind; the whole valued at $10,455 39. These Scriptures were in fourteen languages, viz: English, French, German, Spanish, Welsh, Dutch, Swedish, Danish, Italian, Polish, Latin, Hebrew, Chinese and Indian.

Father Mathews.—The Ipswich (Eng.) Express announces with regret that this worthy man, the great Apostle of Temperance, has become involved in pecuniary difficulties, in consequence of engagements contracted by him in connection with the temperance reformation in Ireland. It was hoped, however, that friends of temperance generally would come forward to the assistance of one who has made so many sacrifices in that good cause and shows himself in every action of his life a thoroughly disinterested and devoted philanthropist.

Feasting a Compositor.—A letter from Hamburgh of the 14th October says: "Last Saturday all persons engaged on the daily journal, the Correspondent Impartial de Hamburgh, celebrated by a dinner the sixtieth anniversary of the entry of one of the compositors, named Hein, on the paper. During that long period he had not missed his work a single day. He is now eighty-eight years of age, enjoys excellent health, and does his work like a young man. There were 220 persons present at the dinner, including all the employing printers of the place.

The Disease in Popatoes.—Some diseased potatoes have been examined by a Boston chemist, Mr. J. E. Telemacher, who expresses his opinion through the New England Farmer, that the disease of the potatoe is a species of fungus; the application of common salt decomposed this fungus. Mr. Telemacher recommends that wherever the disease existed this year, common salt be liberally spread upon the soil. It will do no harm, if no good, and the experiment is certainly worth trying.

Latest from Rio Janeiro.—By the arrival of the barque St. Joseph, we have advices from Rio to the 16th of September last. Politically the news is important. A correspondent writes:

The latest news from Rio Grande is that the war between Buenos Ayres and Brazil has at length commenced in eap

Churches in Paris.—Dr. Cheever in his letters from Europe states, "that all told, of all denominations, there are not more than forty churches" in Paris. And yet the population exceeds a million. Not more than 40,000 of this vast number could be accommodated with church room, were they disposed to occupy it. The result of prevailing infidelity and ungodliness gendered in the bosom of the Romish church.

Propagation of Sound.—A writer in the Quarterly Review makes the following statement:

"When the ground is hard and dry, or rests upon a continuous stratum of rock, sound is propagated to a great distance; and hence it is the practice in many countries to ascertain the approach of horsemen by applying the ear to the ground. The sound of cannon has been heard at a great distance. Guns discharged at Carlscrona were heard as far as Denmark, a distance of at least 120 miles. In sailing from Asia Minor to Egypt, Dr. Clark heard the sound of a sea fight at a distance of 120 miles. Dr. Hearn heard guns fired at Stockholm, at a distance of 180 British miles, and the cannonade of a naval engagement between the Dutch and English, in 1072, was heard across England as far as Shrewsbury, and even in Wales, a distance of about 200 miles."

Filial Love.—It is mentioned by Miss Pardoe, that a "beautiful feature in the character of the Turks is reverence for the mother. Their wives may advise or reprimand unheeded, but their mother is an oracle, consulted, confided in, listened to with respect, or with deference honored, to the latest hour, and remembered with affection and regard even beyond the grave."—"Wives may die," say they, "and we can replace them, children may perish, and others may be born to us, but who shall restore the mother when she passes away, and is seen no more?"

A political editor of Baltimore, a Virginian by birth, says the people of Maryland "have no love for slavery. There is a sentiment on this subject, which is growing daily, and will ere long command respect, and demand a hearing in a form wholly constitutional in a national as well as Marylandic sense."

A monument has recently been placed in the Cemetery at Mount Auburn, to the memory of the Rev. Dr. Channing. It was designed by the late Mr. Allston, whose directions were strictly observed, and was erected in compliance with a resolution of the religious society of which he whose remains it covers was the minister. It is a quadrangular monument, of white Italian marble, with a large square base of stages, portions of which are deeply undercut, to produce the effect of light and shadow, surmounted by equilateral die, having panels on its four sides, above which is a Roman sepulchral cornice or slab, supporting on its center a low open vase.

A deaf and dumb person being asked, "what is forgiveness?" took a pencil and wrote a reply, containing a volume of the most exquisite poetry, as well as deep truth, in these few words: "It is the odor which flowers yield when trampled upon."

Interesting Relic.—The Bible once owned and used by the Rev. David Brainerd, the missionary, is in Tinmouth, in the possession of the wife of Hon. A. Noble, a relative of Brainerd. The volume, which is of the 12mo size, is somewhat worn, and has many verses marked with a pen, by the former owner. [Vt. Chronicle.

A Mahometan Tradition.—The Mahometan era commenced A. D. 622, or 1222 years ago. But the Mahometan year contains only 354 days, so that 1222 of our years would equal 1260 of their years. It is said they have a tradition that at the close of 1260 of their time, "the Crescent will turn pale and be darkened before the rising glory of the Cross." The Lord speed the accomplishment of the prediction. [Zion's Adv.

SUMMARY.

"The result of the recent elections, in several of the States, has impressed my mind with one deep and strong conviction; that is, that there is an imperative necessity for reforming the naturalization laws of the United States. The preservation of the government, and consequently the interest of all parties, in my opinion, clearly and strongly demand this. The Largest Axe Factoay in the World.—An exchange paper describes an Axe Factory near Hartford, Ct., in which 45 men employed, turn out EIGHT HUNDRND AXES every day! The axes sell for $13 per dozen upon an average!! The demand for them is almost illimitable. They labor in seven shops.

The sixth shop is sacred, "no admittance" is written upon the door post. The reason for this is that a new process for tempering the axes has been discovered—a process by which a hundred can be tempered at once, and that, too, after they have been ground. This is a great discovery, and it will make the fortune of its inventor.

Election Returns.—Since the publication of our last, returns have been received from the elections in several of the States. The result is much more favorable to Mr. Polk than was anticipated even by his friends. It is so favorable to him thus far, that the opposing party has given up all hope. The Tribune of Wednesday morning gives the result as follows: Electoral votes certain for Mr. Polk, 152; certain for Mr. Clay, 89; doubtful, 34. In Massachusetts, where the election took place on Monday last, Mr. Clay's majority over Mr. Polk was about 14,000. The Liberty Party vote was about 10,000.

Many interesting facts have been already ascertained, and it is hoped that the explorations, which are now actively going on, will reveal much that is curious, and help to explain some passages in Scripture—especially some connected with the doings of the prophet Jonas.

PROCLAMATION.

By Wm. C. Bouck, Governor of the State of New York.

Another year has nearly drawn to a close, and surrounded as we are by the unnumbered blessings of God's Providence and grace, nothing can be more becoming and proper than to lay aside all secular engagements, and devote at least one day of the many we are allowed to call our own, to devout Thanksgiving and praise to the Author of the constant and unmerited mercies we, as a people, are permitted to enjoy.

I do therefore most cordially recommend that THURSDAY, THE TWELFTH DAY OF DECEMBER next, be observed throughout the State, as a day of Prayer, Praise and Thanksgiving to our great Father in Heaven, our gracious Benefactor and Friend.

By His merciful providence we have been permitted to enjoy the comforts of life, and our religious, social and political privileges have been continued to us. During the past year, we have been exempt from the ravages of maliguant disease, and the earth has yielded her increase; a growing prosperity has been felt in all the business relations of life, and the blessed Gospel has been gradually but surely extending its benign influence. Actuated by its diffuse benevolence, Christian Missionaries have not only labored among the waste and desolate places at home, but have gone forth to proclaim "Christ and him crucified" to the dark and benighted regions of the earth:—Education, in all its departments, is diffusing an increase of knowledge among all classes of the community:—Temperance, the handmaid of Religion, is making deeper and wider impressions, and sending joy and comfort into many desolate households: while peace and prosperity are dwelling in our midst.

Let us, then, as one people, on the day designated, lay aside the cares and the ordinary business of life, and give thanks unto God. And with our thanksgivings let us mingle our prayers for a continuance of the numerous blessings we enjoy, and especially that there may be an outpouring of the Spirit of God, to revive pure and undefiled religion among us: the best security of our civil and political institutions.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto affixed my name, and the privy seal of the State, this eighth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-four.

[L. S.] WM. C. BOUCK.

MARRIED,

On Tuesday, Nov. 12, 1844, by the Rev. Geo. B. Utter, JOHN HUNTER TOBITT, of New-York, to Miss MARY B. INSHAW, late of Springfield, Mass.

DIED,

At his residence in Westerly, R. I., on the 7th inst., after an illness of three weeks, JOHN COTTRELL, aged 63 years.

In Westerly, on the same day, SILAS BURKE, youngest son of John Crandall, aged 8 years.

In North Stonington, Ct., on the 8th inst., HENRY CRANDALL, aged 44 years.

In Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y., Oct. 3d, MARIA E. IRISH, wife of Geo. Irish, Jr., and daughter of Benjamin Potter, of Hopkinton, aged 34 years.

The deceased became interested early in the love of Christ, and was received as a member of His church in Hopkinton, R. I. Though cut off in early life, she had won the affection of a large circle of acquaintances; whose attachment to her was strengthened by her brilliant talents, and her lasting friendship.

On the day of her burial, a scene was witnessed, which it would be in vain to attempt to describe. Just as the long train of relatives were arranging in rear of an extended procession of citizens to convey her earthly remains from the house of God to their narrow resting place, a carriage was discovered in the distance. It bore her father and mother. Near five hundred miles they had journeyed to enjoy one more interview with their beloved daughter. But alas! death had interposed, and they could now only bedew with their tears the remains of the deceased. Another hour, and even those remains would have been concealed in the tomb. The great Shepherd only can temper the wind to the shorn lamb.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y. The fall term will open on WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 14th, under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

President of the Board of Trustees

AN ADDRESS TO THE BAPTISTS OF THE UNITED STATES, from the Seventh day Baptist General Conference; wherein is shown the perpetual obligation upon Jew and Gentile to observe God's Holy Sabbath, as INSTITUTED IN PARADISE upon the SEVENTH or last day of each week; and the subsequent substitution of the FIRST day is shown to be inconsistent with the institution, and subversive of the Bible as a perfect rule of faith.

Miscellaneous.

IT IS FINISHED.

It is finished!—thy greatness, O Salem! is strown—
Thy glory is shrouded—thy dwellings are lone;
The song of the minstrel is hushed in thy halls,
And the plough of the foeman goes over thy walls!

The Kedron is dyed with thy gore as it runs;
The flame in thy temple—the chain on thy sons;
For the blood of the guiltless is red on thy brow;
And the arm, that upheld thee, abandons thee now.

It is finished!—the work of redemption is done;
The combat is ended—the victory won;
The strength of the false one is vanquished and shorn,
The crown of the spoiler is trampled and torn.

And the wail of the suffering Redeemer is o'er,
And the darkness shall rest on the Gentile no more;
For the banner of truth to the sunshine unfurled,
Goes forth to the uttermost ends of the world.

THE SCHOOLMASTER IN IRELAND.

Mr. Kohl, in his late interesting work on Ireland, thus describes a "hedge school:"

"I had an opportunity, by the roadside, of seeing a genuine Irish hedge school, and truly an interesting and affecting spectacle it was. The school-house was a clay cabin, roofed with sods, and without so much as a window. The smaller of the ragged scholars sat as close as they could to the entrance, towards which they turned their books, to catch as much as possible of the light without. Some were lying on the ground; behind these were a few seated on a board, and behind these were a few taller boys leaning over those in front, likewise to catch the light. The teacher was seated in the midst of the group; and was clad in what I have already described as the national costume of the country. In a book of Irish sketches, the picture would have been invaluable. And I was sorry I had not a daguerreotype apparatus with me to perpetuate the impression. In front of the school-room lay as many pieces of turf as there were students within, each boy having brought it as a tribute to his teacher. As I entered the narrow entrance, the dominie rose from an inverted butter cask, on which he had sat enthroned.

'Indeed, I am very sorry, your honor,' said he, 'that I have not the opportunity of offering you a chair.' He was teaching his pupils the English alphabet, and they all looked fresh and cheerful, notwithstanding their poverty—as indeed most Irish children do, in the country at least, despite their ragged attire and scanty food.

Both children and teacher lived some way from their school-house, which stood by the side of the road. When the hours of study are over, the boys thrust their spelling books into their pockets—and the master, after having fastened the door of his college, collects the tributary turf into a sack, throws the burthen over his shoulder, and, having grasped his staff, trudges away to his cabin, on the other side of the bog."

HINTS TO SCHOOL TEACHERS.

Keep good order, but be not tyrannical and overbearing.

For keeping good order, strive to obtain the love and respect of your scholars, and you may then lead them at your pleasure.

Govern chiefly by reason and persuasion.

Never strike a scholar in passion, nor punish more than is absolutely necessary.

Be very careful that you use no partiality.

Be patient in the discharge of all your duties.

See that what is learned, is learned perfectly.

In reading, let the inflections of the voice be perfectly natural.

Never let any thing pass unexplained, which you have the least reason to think the scholar does not perfectly understand.

The last thing mentioned has been grossly neglected by most teachers, so that many a youth has understood nothing of much that he has committed to memory until his riper judgment comprehended it.

As there are consequences depending upon the manner of rearing the tender minds as lasting as eternity, it is highly important that every teacher should feel that he is forming characters for another world, and his example, his precepts, and all his actions, will have an important bearing upon the future destiny of his pupils.

BEER DRINKERS—LOCK JAW.

Many people suppose that beer is both an innocent and a healthy beverage, but those who have had considerable experience in the matter assure us that its effect upon the system is worse even than that produced by ardent spirits. The noxious ingredients often—perhaps we should say universally—used in the manufacture of this article, render it peculiarly inappropriate to be taken into the system; and its deleterious effects are rendered sufficiently apparent from the fact, that physicians and surgeons almost always dislike to undertake the cases of sick or wounded men who have been habitual beer drinkers. An English paper, some time since, stated that "medical men in the metropolis are familiar with the fact, that confirmed beer drinkers can scarcely scratch their fingers without risk of their lives. A copious London beer-drinker is all one vital part. He wears his heart upon his sleeve, bare to a death wound, even from a rusty nail or the claw of a cat. The worst patients brought into the metropolitan hospitals are those apparently fine models of health and strength, the beer-drinkers." The slightest wound to a beer drinker often terminates in lock-jaw. Intelligent physicians in our own country, we believe, generally attest the truth of these remarks; and upon the whole, it seems as though "water, bright water," being the beverage the Almighty has provided for us, is the most suitable one for us to use.

SAW-MILLS.

By an article in the North American Review, we learn that the first saw mill, of which there is any record, was erected at Madeira in the year 1520; the second was at Breslau, seven years later; but their multiplication in Europe proceeded very slowly. One was erected in London in 1633, but it was demolished soon afterwards, that it might not be the means of depriving the poor of employment. About 1730 a company was incorporated in England, which made a large purchase of pine timber, erected mills, and introduced various improvements in the manufacture and transportation of lumber. But the company made themselves odious by the innovation, and the popular feeling against machine saws continued very strong. A saw mill set up at Limehouse, about the year 1768, was destroyed by a mob.

The first built in America was in what is now the town of York, Maine, in 1623, under the direction of Sir Fernando Gorges, and in 1530, mills were put up on the Piscataqua.

The first mill in Massachusetts was built on the Neponsett, at Dorchester, in 1633, and the second in 1656, on the Herring Brook, Scituate. There was one on the Saco as soon as 1653, and one on the Mill River, Taunton, six years afterward. In 1681 another was put up in Plymouth colony, and in 1685 four were in operation at Cape Porpoise, Me. At Machias there was one in 1763, within a year after the first grant of land and mill sites East of the Penobscot.

In the slaveholding States sawing is still extensively done by the hand, and that in the neighborhood of sufficient water power.

AGRICULTURAL ITEMS.

From the Cultivator for November.

The Bitter Rot in Apples.—Mr. J. H. McDewell, of Cumberland county, Pa., informs us that a neighbor of his had two apple trees, the fruit of which was much affected with the bitter rot. Noticing that the ground under the trees was covered with White Plantain, which he thought indicative of a poor soil, he manured the ground heavily with stable manure, and the result is that the trees bear annually fine crops of fruit, not in the least subject to the rot.

Encouragement to Silk Growers.—M. Van Schaack, Esq., of New York, has proposed to give $1,000 to the American Institute, to be awarded as premiums, in sums of $100 annually, to encourage the growth of silk.

Feeding Fowls.—"Which is the best grain for feeding fowls, eggs being the object?"

Fowls require a variety of food. Grain of all kinds is good. Wheat-screenings, which can be had at all mills where wheat is ground, constitute a cheap and good feed for fowls. Buckwheat, barley, oats and Indian corn, should also be given occasionally. They should also have animal food. This may be supplied from the offals of slaughter-houses. If they are kept confined, they should have occasionally some cabbages cut up and given them. Potatoes and turneps will also be found useful.

To make good picklel Pork, simply pack the side-pieces in a barrel or cask, with plenty of salt on all sides of each piece, and when full, roll it to the pump, and pump in water till you see it cease to sink or to moisten the pork on the top of the barrel, then lay a flat stone as large as the vessel, to keep the pork always under the pickle: cover the cask, to exclude flies.

Preservation of Iron.—Dr. Mallett of Dublin, has superintended a series of experiments, in which every kind of paint, oil, and varnish, was applied to every kind of iron, immersed in various kinds of running water, for two years, the result of which proves that coal tar boiled, and laid on the iron while hot, has a very decided advantage over all other preparations. This discovery is of much consequence, as iron vessels are so rapidly and extensively coming into use.

Cooking Food for Swine.—Dr. Lee, in an article on pork-making in the last N. G. Farmer, says:—"From some experiments of my own, and considerable research into the published results of others, I am satisfied that ten bushels of boiled potatoes, thoroughly mixed with the pudding that can be made from three bushels of corn or peas, will make as much pork as twenty bushels of potatoes, and six bushels of corn or peas fed raw."

Potatoe Onions.—The Brockport (N. Y.) Watchman says that Mr. J. Greenleaf, of that place, has raised this season, 500 bushels of potatoe onions from an acre of land. Some of the largest weighed 1 1-2 lbs. each, and were 17 inches in circumference. This kind of onion is thought by some to be valuable as an early sort—they grow wholly in the ground, like the potatoe. They are said to be mild and palatable.

Saving Flower Seed.—Instead of saving seed from any blooms that may chance to remain on, it should be saved from the best well-formed early flowers. The proper way is to mark good flowers as soon as they can be found, and let their seeds ripen well before they are gathered. Let them be from good double flowers. When the seed is rubbed out, only the few outside rows of seed should be used; those which come from the centre or disk, will almost always come high. There are no means so effectual as making the best early blooms of the best varieties, and relying on those pods of seed only. [Gardener and Practical Florist.

Winter Protection for Strawberries.—A writer in the Boston Cultivator says he has tried covering with manure, leaves, sea weed, boughs, and "all other kinds of loose covering;" but they did not answer. The leaves would blow off, and mice would get under and destroy the plants. He recommends cleaning the beds well from weeds, and about the last of October or the first of November, put on from one to two inches of rich loam or old compost, made with muck, and a small quantity of manure, such as has no seeds of weeds, and rake it equally, being particular to have the plants covered so as only to present the center leaves; this protects the roots and tops, and in the spring the beds and borders are all ready for them to grow, and will not need any cultivating until the plants are in blossom, and until the middle of May, and then with a fork about six inches wide, with three round stiff prongs 10 inches long, blunt and round at the end of the prongs, stir the soil.

Ruta bagas should be pulled with a ruta baga hook—a tool with a small sharp hoe on one side to top the root with one stroke, and two prongs on the other for drawing the root after topped, from the ground.

Feed all fattening animals with perfect regularity—enough, but not too much. Save all your straw well, for litter and winter feed.

A Ladies' Dictionary—the word Alpaca. The Alpaca is a South American animal, much used as a beast of burden by the Indians, with long hair, principally black, but slightly grizzled. It is an excessively irritable animal, and indomitable till soothed. The importance of this animal has already been considered by the English, in their hat, woollen and stuff trade, and an essay on the subject has been published by Dr. Hamilton of London. The wool is so remarkable, being a jet black, glossy, silk-like hair, that it is fitted for the production of texile fabrics differing from all others, occupying a medium position between the wool and the silk. It is now mingled with other materials in such a singular manner, that while a particular dye will affect those, it will leave the Alpaca wool with its original black color, thus giving rise to great diversity. FEMALE EDUCATION—DOMESTIC DUTIES.

The education of girls is radically defective in regard to fixed habits of industry, and such a knowledge of domestic economy, as would make them useful and independent in any situation. There are two points of view, in which the present state of things in this respect, is most unhappy, and injurious in its effects. First, in its influence on the young ladies themselves, who are "fashionably" trained; and second, in its tendency to discourage manual labor, by rendering all useful employment disreputable and degrading.

Who does not see, as they look around on society, scores and hundreds of young females, "well educated" according to common parlance, who are floating along on the current of fashionable life, in our cities, or even in the comparative seclusion of the country, without one useful end or aim, and whose half dormant faculties seem never roused to healthful and energetic action. To eat, to sleep, to dress, and display themselves and their accomplishments, and to secure a husband, these are the purposes for which they live, and of all else they are as ignorant, as the youthful Georgian or Circassian who pines in the Seraglio of the Grand Sultan. Trained in the lap of ease and indulgence, they live but for themselves, and seem to see nothing beyond this. They have no idea of benevolent effort, or of active, persevering industry. Indeed they regard as pitiful drudgery, the whole routine of domestic employment, and look down almost with contempt on the mother or aunt, or acquaintance, whose time is devoted to such pursuits. If these young ladies marry, they enter upon the important duties of wife and mother, without thought or preparation, and consequently either entirely neglect these duties, or sink beneath the pressure of cares and responsibilities, which to one properly trained, would be comparatively light and pleasant.

Those who are familiar with the story of the Revolution, who have become acquainted with the private history and habits of the principal actors in that event, know that a great change has taken place in the female character since the times of '76. Then, not only the wives and daughters of the stout yeomanry of our country were inured to habits of useful industry, but those noble matrons, whose names will go down to the latest posterity with honor, were patterns of frugality and domestic economy. Mrs. Washington and Mrs. Adams, each in her own appropriate sphere, exemplified Solomon's idea of a virtuous woman, in looking "well to the ways of her household," while in dignity of manners, mental cultivation, and enlarged philanthropy, few indeed among the females of the present day, can be considered their superiors. They regarded home as the peculiar sphere of woman's labors and enjoyments; and never dreamed that any employment was degrading, which added to the comforts of that home, or of the husband and children who shared it with them. Now what has caused the great change in the female character and habits, which has taken place since that period? Is it that the youthful female of the present day is naturally less industrious, less affectionate, or even less energetic? Does the fashionable lounger, whose time is wasted in idleness and vanity, and who knows nothing of manual labor only that it is something very vulgar and very disagreeable; differ naturally, from the young heroine, who cut the fleece from the back of the sheep, spun, wove, dressed the cloth, and cut and made the garment for her brother who was going to Bunker Hill, all in forty-eight hours, from the time she heard of his intended departure? Nay, verily. It is education only that makes them to differ, and I contend that the former is "more sinned against, than sinning," in the aimless and useless life she leads.

It is the province of the mother, to train her daughters to habits of industry and usefulness, and if from false views, or mistaken tendencies, she neglect this duty, no one else can do it half so well. Every healthy young woman ought to be so trained as to be able to make her own way through the world, without the necessity of dependence on any other. No matter what her rank or station may be; she ought, in the common language of the community, to be able to support herself through life. For the want of this, how many do we see, who from the loss of parents or fortune, or both, are thrown on the world utterly helpless and dependent, without the possibility of returning any equivalent for the protection that may be afforded them by friendship or charity. They cannot teach, for though educated in the most expensive schools, they never learned any thing thoroughly. They cannot earn their living by manual labor, for they are ignorant of every useful employment. They cannot even make themselves of any service in the family of a relative or friend, for however amiable and desirous to oblige, their utter want of knowledge or skill, renders it improper to trust them in any capacity. However the fact may be disguised by sympathy and tenderness, they are felt to be a burden, wherever their lot is cast, and if the poor victim of a false system of education have keen sensibilities, she must feel it too, and then, what is life but a wearisome burden, which she must drag on, without hope and without enjoyment to the end? Dark as is the picture, there are originals all around us, in every walk of life. I have one now in my "mind's eye," whose short but sad history I will briefly state as an illustration of these remarks.

Clara R. was a native of one of the loveliest villages which adorn the rich valley of the Connecticut, and the mansion of her father, who was the great man of the place, was distinguished for wealth, refinement and hospitality. It was the stranger's home, and among the crowds who frequented it, there was not one who did not regard the youthful Clara, the only child, and heiress of Mr. R. as one of the most fortunate of human beings. Every advantage which wealth could procure, had been bestowed on her education, and lovely, amiable and accomplished, no defect in her character was visible to the admiring eyes of parents or friends. She was to be sure, utterly ignorant of every useful employment, but she had great wealth, and of course could command the services of others, and it was not to be expected that a young lady of her rank and advantages should stoop to servile labor, degrading as she had been accustomed to consider it. But while Clara was still young, she was taught by bitter experience, that riches, however loved and trusted in, often take to themselves wings and fly away. Her father died suddenly, and in the settlement of his estate by others, large sums were lost, or conveyed away by fraud, so that the poor orphan found herself with a very moderate fortune, instead of the great possessions to which she had looked forward. With industry and economy, this would have been amply sufficient for comfort and independence, but alas, she knew nothing of either. While her money lasted, it was spent with the thoughtless extravagance to which she had been accustomed, and when it was gone, she had no earthly resource but the charity of friends. Some there were who loved her for her parent's sake, and these friends took the desolate Clara home; and kept her until her indolence and vacuity of mind made her society a burden too intolerable to be endured. She came at last, in middle life, to the city, and by her lady-like appearance and manners, and her profession of ardent piety, awakened an interest in the hearts of the benevolent, who exerted themselves to procure for her, board in a respectable family. She represented herself as still in the possession of property sufficient for her support, and made no effort whatever to obtain employment of any kind. After boarding several months in a worthy but poor family, without making payment for her board, she left, and found another place, where the same story was repeated and believed. The expected remittances never came, and Miss R. decamped from a second, a third and a fourth boarding house in the same dishonorable way. She became known at length, as a regular female swindler, and when last seen by the writer, had just been turned into the streets, and came to beg the privilege of staying through the night, with those whose confidence she had so abused. Her old story was still told with unblushing assurance, and she scorned the idea of any assistance which should infringe on her right to be just as idle and useless as she had hitherto been. With her subsequent fate, I am unacquainted, but enough has been told. She was the victim of wrong parental training, for the natural elements of her character would, if rightly directed, have rendered her an ornament, instead of a curse, to society. One who is now before the throne of God, whose life and character were in every respect the opposite of hers, and who knew her in early life, bore testimony to the natural loveliness, and worth of the forlorn being, who drew so largely on her benevolent sympathies and efforts. She attributed all the misery and destitution of Miss R. to the indolence, and ignorance of useful employments, in which she had been reared.

Mothers, if you love your daughters, if their temporal and eternal welfare is an object of concern to you, can you expose them to a fate like this? Can you from indolence, or fear of the world, or misjudging tenderness, suffer them to grow up in ignorance of the important duties which belong to their own appropriate sphere? Why should they not be educated to feel, that home and the domestic concerns of home, are in their proper place, desirable and agreeable? Why should an idea of meanness and degradation be attached to avocations, on which the comfort and happiness of families so much depends? A well ordered household is an object of admiration to all; but how few seem to understand, that a thorough course of preparation on the part of young women, for household duties, is necessary to secure it? There is no magical process by which the indolent, ignorant young girl is transformed at marriage, into an industrious, skilful manager; one who understands her duties, and is ready to perform them. Should she ever become such, it will be by a course of discipline, bitter and humiliating in proportion to the false views previously entertained. Why then should maternal love, so jealous and watchful in many respects, be so fatally behind on this point? Why should the mother, who feels that her own constant care and oversight, (to say no more) are essential to the comfort of her family, forget that the daughter who is growing up at her side, in utter ignorance of domestic duties, is to fill a station similar to her own, and must meet the same duties and responsibilities? Why should she so cruelly neglect the preparation in her case, which is thought so necessary in that of the son, who is apprenticed for years, to the merchant or mechanic? There is certainly a great error in judgment here, and when carried into practice, it becomes a fatal one. Fatal to domestic enjoyment, to individual character, and to the well being of society at large. [Adv. Moral Reform.

THE SOURCES OF LICENTIOUSNESS.

NO. III.—THE LOVE OF EXCITEMENT.

BY DR. WM. ALCOTT.

Another cause of that love of nervous excitement which every where prevails, and which, as I have already said, is greatly increasing, is the use of alkali, as a seasoning. All drugs and medicines used with food, under the popular name of seasonings, while they gratify the appetite for the time, feed and increase that love of excitement which seems to be deeply implanted in our fallen nature. Yet when we consider all the attendant circumstances, I know of no one which is doing more mischief, at present, than that which is about to receive our consideration.

By alkali, is here meant, of course, the substances which are used in cooking under the various names of pearl-ash, saleratus, soda, &c. My remarks, however, will be aimed chiefly at pearl-ash and saleratus.

The quantity of saleratus, or vegetable alkali, which is used in our country, is already immense, and is increasing with a fearful rapidity. I have conversed with intelligent housekeepers and heads of families, from Maine to Georgia, and from the Atlantic to the Lakes, and I find but one voice on the subject, viz. "We use a great deal more saleratus than formerly."

In the British province of New Brunswick, the use of this drug is so extensive as to cause diseases of the intestines, which often terminate in death. Physicians there, give it as their frequent opinion, in regard to complaints of the stomach and bowels, that they were caused by saleratus.

In southern Maine, also, this drug is used with great freedom. On the Penobscot it is not at all uncommon for large families to consume ten or twelve pounds of it in a year. In some parts of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New York, it is used to an extent equally alarming.

Riding in a stage coach not long since, in the eastern part of Connecticut, one of the passengers, a housekeeper, belonging to Willimantic, having read some of my books, especially the "Young Housekeeper," took occasion to make inquiries on the philosophy of cookery; and among other things, on the use of saleratus. When I told her that up to twenty years ago, I never knew it used in bread, except to correct acidity, she held up her hands in astonishment, and asked how it could be eaten. Why not? said I. Because it would be so tough, she replied.

So rapid has been the introduction of this drug into cookery, that I have good reason for believing that as many families among us use ten pounds a year, as used one pound twenty years ago. In New Brunswick, it is usual to carry home a bucket of saleratus with every barrel of flour. In most places in New England and the Middle States, less is used; but we are "coming on."

It is not against the use of alkali as a corrector of acidity, that I wish to speak; for in that case it is no longer alkali. If acetic acid is present in the dough, the union of the potash of the saleratus with the acid forms a new salt, the acetate of potash; which, though slightly injurious, is less so than the saleratus. What I object to, however, is the excess of the latter. Whenever and wherever saleratus goes into the human stomach as saleratus, it is injurious and exciting, in proportion to its quantity.—Whether it is found in bread, to make it brittle and tender, and give it a flavor, or in cakes of various kinds, makes little difference; it is still saleratus—it is still an alkali; it still grows upon (so to speak) the coats of the intestines.

I did not intend to enter so much into the philosophy of cookery; but it seemed needful in order to expose the dangers of the community from alkali. In general, the quantity of the alkali which is used is not enough to cause deep seated intestinal disease at once, except when the bowels are predisposed to it. A more common case is that we receive just enough of it to feed the love of excitement, and keep up a morbid or diseased appetite.

The individual who cannot relish a particular dish, a loaf of bread even, unless it is highly seasoned with saleratus, will not be likely to relish plain things of any kind. All things must be highly exciting, or they will not go down. But more than this—and here comes the main point at issue—this love of excitement not only favors an indirect road to licentiousness, but a direct one. I will not say it is a royal road, though many a member of royal families has travelled it—but next to salt, perhaps, it leads more certainly to the chambers of death to reputation, than any other.

Saltpetre is injurious, greatly so, as all medical men of intelligence will assure us. So are pepper, mustard, spice, cloves, and other aromatics. So also are butter, and all greasy substances. The last remark might lead to farther reflections of the same general bearing with the former; but of this, enough for the present; perhaps, forever. Let it suffice to say, that they who would keep themselves pure, and keep pure their children and friends, or at least save them from that love of excitement which so often leads to impurity, and always increases the activity of the animal passions, should study the art of keeping cool. They should avoid, as they would the cholera, everything of an exciting kind which is not indispensable to health.

This subject has strong claims on all the friends of moral reform, and indeed on all the friends of Christianity; but it is on mothers and teachers and house-keepers, more than all others, that I would urge its consideration. Ye who rule the world—in mis-rule—will ye not exert yourselves to rule it in truth and righteousness? Ye know something of the connexion between physical and moral purity; will ye not save the stomach, as much as you can, from becoming enslaved to the love of excitement?

AN ODE FOR THE SABBATH.

ADDRESSED TO MY SOUL.

By Rev. Daniel Noble, who was Pastor of the Sabbath-keeping Church in Mill Yard, London, from the death of Robert Cornthwaite, in 1755, to his own death, in 1783.

Mount, take thy flight, my soul, and soar
Far as thy callow wings
Will bear thee up—till thou canst tune
Th' high praises of thy God!
Aloud in joyous strains proclaim,
That with unwearied care
Heaven's potentate supreme consults
The happiness of man.

Make thou his undeserved grace,
His mercies numberless,
The constant subject of thy song,
And of thy silent hour
Of meditation; his great name
With ceaseless hymns of praise
Exalt, and let this copious theme,
Each of thy powers engross.

View the fixed, view the rolling
Fires of heaven's azure arch;
View the smooth verdure of the meads;
Behold the nodding shades
Of the cool forest; feast thy smell
With what sweet odours flow
From each flower-spangled dale; attend
To the melodious lays
Of Philomela, when the glade
Imbrown'd the hotter rays
Excludes; next on the verdant bank
Of some pure chrystal rill.
Attentive to its gurgling fall,
Extend thy limbs and read
Thy features in its mirror'd brim;
Then say, if all these scenes
Of joy, that nature's face o'erspread,
Are not illustrious proofs
That God is ever good to all.
The structure of thyself
View next, with obvious characters
Of sovereign goodness stamp'd;
And mark what bright ingredients shine
In other human frames;
Nor let the author of all these
Be unindulgent thought,
Or destitute of any charm
That goodness can attend.

But most the mercies which his WORD
Reveals, should yield thee joy:
Joy full of rapture, whilst thy tongue,
With all its eloquence,
Thy admiration thus unfolds:
—"O thou by whom was made
Whate'er the world contains, how good,
How gracious all thy works,
Unnumber'd as they are, appear,
To every thoughtful mind!
How must thy throne then shine, emboss'd
With mercy's brightest gems,
Since this low world, this earth, displays
That thou art good—Oh, how Supremely good! to all thy works,
Dispensing happiness!
But, most of all, to man's frail race,
Indulgent and benign,
Thou heapest blessings more than thought
Can count, on all who tread,
Tread wisely, virtue's blissful paths.
Oh, then, in every state
Of life, and at the stern approach
Of death, each sacred day,
Yea, and each common hour, let me
With grateful zeal extol
Thy perfect goodness, who alone
Canst yield me solid joy."

LETTER FROM THE MILL YARD CHURCH, LONDON.

The following letter was read before the last General Conference, and is referred to in the printed proceedings of that body. We cheerfully comply with a request to insert it in the Recorder.

To the Churches of the Lord Jesus Christ, observing the Seventh-Day Sabbath, in America, assembled in their General Conference—The Church of the same order, commonly called the Seventh-Day General Baptist Church, or Sabbath-keeping Congregation, in Mill Yard, in Goodman's Fields, London, in Great Britain, sendeth greeting.

DEAR BRETHREN,—Having, though tardily, renewed our correspondence with you, after the interruption of more than half a century, first caused by that monstrous crime of both our nations, war, and afterward continued by reason of our own depressed and afflicted circumstances as a Church; we rejoiced to hear from you, to be visited by your Recording Secretary, brother George B. Utter, to receive the printed proceedings of your last General Conference, as a proof of your fraternal regard and confidence, and to be favored by an epistle, full of kindness and consolation, addressed by your Corresponding Secretary, brother Thomas B. Stillman, in October last, to our Elder. We have since determined to communicate with you, not only by the letters of our Elder, to which we have (by our former letter of 1840) desired you to give credence, but by a yearly epistle from ourselves as a Church, to your General Conference, of which we request you to consider us, for the purpose of such friendly correspondence, as an actual member.

We have read, not only in private, but in our church meetings, and duly deliberated upon, your printed Minutes; and, having carefully considered what remarks it behoved us to make thereupon, we have come to the following resolutions:—

"That the thanks of this church be given to the American brethren, for sending the printed Minutes of their proceedings to us; and that we are desirous of being regularly supplied with the like communication of their transactions, in which we take the deepest interest.

"That, while this church rejoices to know that its attempt at renewing its ancient correspondence with the American Sabbath-keepers has met with the approbation of the brethren; yet we are much concerned to find that the letter from this church, dated 8th December, 1840, which was transmitted to the late Corresponding Secretary, was not duly laid before the Conference, but that the knowledge which the brethren had of our own letter and of Elder's letter, appears to have been derived only from printed copies, published before the meeting of the Conference.*

"That this Church fully agrees in the several Reports on brother Hull's questions relative to church constitution, and on brother Paul Stillman's motion relative to the religious observation of the evening before the seventh day of the week, as severally adopted by the Conference; the same being in perfect harmony with the sentiments and practice of this Church; and that, while we approve of the numerical denomination of the days of the week (excepting the Sabbath,) and always use it for ecclesiastical and official purposes, yet we experience too much difficulty in this country, in carrying out that usage in the ordinary concerns of life, to make it our universal practice.

"That, if the knowledge of our brethren's intentions to hold a day of fasting and prayer on the first day of the ninth month (commonly called November) last year, had not arrived too late, this Church would have joined most heartily in the observance of the same, according to the ancient usage of this Church, and would have requested the other Sabbath-keeping congregation in this country to join us in so doing.

"That this Church has learned, with much pleasure, that friendly endeavors have been made by the neighboring Churches, to aid in the restoration of the ancient church at Newport, in Rhode Island, (with which this church had maintained a great part of its correspondence before the American war;) having been grieved to learn, from brother Utter, that it was fallen into a lamentable state of weakness and adversity.

"That the advancing state of true religion, and the increasing numbers and prosperity of the Sabbath-keeping churches generally, in America, afford us great pleasure, and call for our warmest congratulation with our brethren, and thanks to the great Head of the Churches.

"That this Church highly commends the condemnation of slavery, so boldly denounced by the Conference as a sin against God; earnestly hopes that the American Sabbath-keepers hold no fellowship with any persons who practice or countenance it; and trusts that the churches will do their duty, if any who are guilty of it stand in their communion, by putting away from them that wicked thing, with all holy jealousy for the glory of Christ and his Gospel.

"That, as to the Confession of Faith set forth with the Minutes of the last Conference, while this church cannot admit that subscription to, or agreement with, any human forms of doctrine should be made the ground of fellowship, (holding as it does the sole sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures for doctrine and practice, and the inalienable right of private judgment,) yet it admires the spirit of liberality which pervades that document, and finds that (with the exception of some expressions in the first, second, and fifth articles) it is in full agreement with our own sentiments, practice, and discipline, and contains a valuable summary of the Christian religion."

We have been called upon to sympathize with our sister Church in London, by occasion of the death of its pastor, JOHN BRITTAIN SHENSTON, whom his gracious Master hath called to his rest, in the 69th year of his age, and the 18th of his ministry there. He died on the 12th day of the third month (May,) and was buried at the new Cemetery in Abney Park.

Our Elder will acquaint you farther with such matters as may arise for your information; and we heartily commend you, both in your united deliberations, and in your several Churches, to the blessing of God Almighty, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the partaking of the richest gifts of the blessed Spirit of God. Farewell.

Given in Church Meeting, First Day, this fourth of the sixth month [August,] 1844.

By order and on behalf of the church,

WILLIAM HENRY BLACK,
Elder and Pastor.

* It is due to the late Cor. Sec. to state, that the reason of this was satisfactorily given to the Conference.

NATURAL DEPRAVITY OF MAN.

Dr. Gill was once preaching on the natural depravity and spiritual inability of man. A gentleman, who heard the sermon, was greatly offended; and taking an opportunity some time after of calling on the doctor, told him that in his opinion, he had degraded that noble being, man, and laid him much too low. "Pray sir," answered the doctor, "how much do you think men can contribute toward their own conversion and salvation?" "Man can do such and such things," replied the gentleman; reckoning up a long string of free-will abilities. "And have you done all this for yourself?" said the doctor. "Why no, I cannot say I have yet, but I hope I shall begin soon." "If you really have done these things in your power," replied the doctor, "and have not done them for yourself, you deserve to be doubly damned; and are but ill qualified to stand up for that imaginary free-will, which according to your own confession, has done you so little good. However, after you have made yourself spiritually whole (if ever you find yourself able to do it,) be kind enough to come and let me know how you went about it; for at present, I know but of one remedy for human depravation, namely, the efficacious grace of Him, who worketh in men both to will and to do of his own good pleasure."

SUPPORT OF BUDHISM.

The following extract from a letter by Mr. Jones, who has given much attention to the subject, will show the number of priests about Bangkok, and the means by which Budhism is supported:—

"When at home, I was accustomed to estimate the priests at 10,000 to 15,000, from knowing how many there were in several wats; making an average, and multiplying by the number of wats. I now learn that there is a regular register of all the priests connected with the wats patronized directly by the king, amounting to about forty. This register embraces the names of 7,300, exclusive of noviciates, who also wear the yellow cloth. To all these priests the king distributes a monthly allowance of money, varying from half a tical to twenty ticals apiece. My teacher is one of the distributors, and goes, on the first day of every month, to the treasury to draw and pay over the money. The royal wats are, of course, most numerously attended; but besides them there are in Bangkok and immediate vicinity 100 other wats, whose occupants will vary from six to thirty. Suppose fifteen to be the average, and we have 1,500 to be added to 7,300, making 8,600. The noviciates may be supposed half as numerous as the priests, 4,400; or, in round numbers, altogether would be 13,000.

"It will hence be seen that the king pays annually an immense sum to sustain Budhism. But this item is insignificant compared with what he pays for building temples and ornamenting them. His whole annual disbursement directly to uphold Budhism, in all probability exceeds the contributions of all Christian denominations in America for Bible, Tract, Education, and Missionary Societies put together. It will be replied, "His revenue then must be immense, enormous!" It is so. That raised on the manufacture and sale of ardent spirits is 72,000 ticals, [a tical is about $6.60] per annum; that on gambling 91,200 ticals, a triennial poll tax on Chinamen residing here, 2,520,000 ticals. To these add duties on foreign shipping, on sugar, rice, fruit trees, cocoa-nut, oil, markets, and an impost on almost every article of produce in the kingdom.

"The salaries paid to government officers are a mere trifle, and besides them there are very few outgoes, except for priests and temples. When I reflect on this state of things, I cannot but suppose there is a great battle to be fought here yet before Budhism can be displaced by our holy faith. And who shall fight it? Who will enlist in this warfare? Who?"

POOR PREACHING.

We have a great deal of good preaching, but great complaints are made that we have a vast amount of poor preaching. If so, the fault is often doubtless in the minister; but may it not sometimes be attributable to other causes? I have a few in my mind just now, and by your leave I will state them.

1. I should expect poor preaching when a minister has a poor library, and no money to make additions to his scanty stock of books. The few volumes he possesses may be antiquated, or have been superseded by works of more recent date, to which he ought to have access. The press is teeming with new publications, but alas! he cannot purchase them. No wonder his preaching is poor, for it exhibits no research—no variety.

2. I should look for poor preaching when a minister must employ much of his time in attending to the temporal wants of his family, occupying nearly all his attention, and distracting his mind with care and anxiety. He cannot afford to keep "hired help," and it would be cruel to place all the burden on a feeble wife. How can he study to advantage while screwing and economizing to obtain a scanty subsistence?

3. How can we expect any thing but poor preaching, when a minister is under the necessity of engaging in some secular employment to procure temporal sustenance? For instance; to teach school a few months in winter, and to work on the farm in summer. Will he not be likely to get a few scraps from Clark, Benson, Watson, &c., and deliver them to his congregation, instead of studying the word of God for himself? Is it not probable some of his hearers may say, "I have read that before," and call it poor preaching.

4. We have sometimes poor preaching, when the house in which worship is held is uncomfortable. To find the sanctuary out of repair, neglected and cold, is enough to impair, if not destroy, all hallowed, elevated, and cheerful feelings in the preacher's mind. Is it not probable he will think the meeting-house a true type of the spiritual condition of his hearers? If his preaching under such circumstances is not poor, it must be attributed to the influence from above.

5. I often think we have poor preaching when the minister's salary is not promptly paid up. Should he get the whole as it becomes due, it is barely sufficient to procure the necessary articles of living, and keep him out of debt; and may he not feel mortified when the Sabbath comes, that he cannot pay his creditors, especially if they form a part of his audience.

6. I always expect poor preaching when the preacher spends the greater part of the week in visiting, and gossipping, and reading newspapers, instead of spending, at least four hours every day in close study—in fervent prayer—and in holy meditation on the word of God, in his closet.—Such a minister may think the people unkind because they do not listen with deep attention to his harangues, and loose declamation, from Sabbath to Sabbath. But let him apply himself to hard, prayerful study, and the people will seldom say that they hear poor preaching from him.

GOING TO CHURCH TOO MUCH.

Philip Henry said, 'I find it much easier to go six miles to hear a sermon, than to spend one quarter of an hour in meditating upon it, and praying over it in secret when I come home.'

And he was not alone in that thing. Many, the great majority of church-going people, do not give themselves time to 'inwardly digest' what they hear, and to pray in secret over the word.

'Go, go, go,' is the cry, and they go to meeting three or four times every Sunday, and what time for rest, for reflection, for reading the word of God, for secret prayer, for the perusal of choice and devotional works, is left to one whose time is thus consumed.

There is such a thing as religious dissipation. And the tendency is so strong towards it in some minds, that I have often thought two sermons on one day was quite as much as is profitable to hear. If they are received with attention, diligently pondered and remembered, and the remainder of the day is occupied faithfully with the private duties of the Christian, I have no doubt that the true design of the Sabbath will be more effectually answered than by any other course.

"DAYS OF OLD."

THE PASSOVER IN THE WILDERNESS.

"What meaneth this, my mother?" asked a little one of Merab's household, who had been borne in his parent's arms through the channel of the Red Sea, too young to take note of what was passing around him, beyond the laugh of babyish delight that greeted the beauteous sparkle of those walls of water. Seated now at the board, round which the elder males of the family had stood, sandalled and girded, and with staff in hand, while they ate with unleavened bread and bitter herbs the flesh of the lamb, this little one lisped forth the query already anticipated by Divine wisdom, and Merab, preventing his wife, replied in a firm and joyous tone, "This is done, my child, because of that which the Lord did unto me, when I came forth out of Egypt. It is the sacrifice of the Lord's passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel, when He smote the Egyptians and delivered our houses." The infant fixed its large bright eyes upon his face, and smiled, more at the pleasant tone of voice than at any clear idea conveyed to the tender mind by what was spoken; while a deep murmur of solemn praise burst from the lips of those whose memory recalled the first celebration of the holy rite beneath the comfortless roofs of Goshen; and contrasted with their past bondage the light and liberty of the present season.

But Jabin, while fervently blessing the Most High for past deliverances and present mercies, had his mind more intently fixed on what was yet to come. A whole year had elapsed since they left Goshen; but their progress had been greatly retarded by the successive acts of rebellion, provoking the Eternal to delay those blessings which Jabin knew must yet arrive, since His mouth had spoken it. The tabernacle had been finished, and on the four sides thereof were the twelve tribes of Israel encamped, each under his own standard; presenting a glorious spectacle of order and beauty and strength. The offerings of the princes had been accepted: for each two of them a covered wagon and a pair of goodly oxen, which by the Divine command were given to the Levites; and when the anointing of the altar took place, a multitude of costly gifts had been accepted, consisting of gold and silver vessels for the service of the sanctuary; of fine flour, and oil, and incense, and beasts for sacrifice, until the wealth of Pharaoh's impoverished bondsmen became a marvel even unto themselves, brought together in so many costly forms before them. The holy and mysterious rites alloted to Aaron and his sons had been duly performed; and above the framework of the temple rested the bright cloud of glory, the unerring guide of Israel's way. In all and each of these transactions young Jabin took an interest so vivid, that what he contemplated by day revisited his eyes even in sleep, and kept him in perpetual communion with high and holy thoughts; but the aspiration of his soul ever was to see the cloud gather up its spiral volumes, and move majestically onward. He knew the word of promise spoken to Abraham; he dwelt on the dying words of Joseph, whose embalmed body was surrounded by a chosen band, entrusted with that precious charge; and Jabin felt that the wilderness was not Israel's rest, howsoever honored with daily proofs that the Divine Presence was there, feeding, refreshing, sustaining, guiding that vast multitude. He had seen the slaughter of rebellious sinners; he heard too often the outbreaks of murmuring discontent; he felt that the Eternal was not requited according to the glorious things that He had done for His people, and an undefined longing, quickened by an undefined apprehension of evil, kept his spirit ever on the wing towards the promised land.

On this evening, Jabin felt his soul peculiarly refreshed and roused; for the commemoration of that miraculous deliverance was to him a solid earnest of mercies yet to come. Looking back on Egypt, he thereby looked forward to Canaan, as though the strip of country to be apportioned to himself was already under cultivation of his own hand; as though his own vine already mantled the door of some peaceful dwelling, and his own fig tree already spread its grateful shade above his head. As night closed in—a joyous night it was to the many thousands of Israel!—the tent of the testimony seemed wrapped in living fire, so brightly glowed the kindling cloud above it; and Jabin thought, while gazing on its glorious folds, and listening to the songs of praise that now and again would burst from the surrounding tents, filling the air with melody, how bright in surpassing splendor must be the highest heaven where the Eternal dwells—how ravishing the songs of those angelic hosts which evermore surround the throne of God. A foreboding of some coming sorrow was upon his mind; but it was swallowed up in hopes that earth could not bind, hopes fed upon the sweet assurance that the Lord, who had again and again renewed and multiplied the ties that bound His people to Him, would never forsake the lowliest there, whose heart was bent to walk the way of His commandments. Rest, Jabin, on that sure stay of thy Creator's boundless love: thou hast his gracious word, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

DIFFERENT KINDS OF RELIGION.

Rev. Mr. Barnes, in his sermon before the missionary meeting at Worcester, Mass., enumerated the following kinds of religion as prevalent at the present time:—

1. There is the religion of sentiment, that finds its enjoyment in the contemplation of the beautiful and grand, either on the page of nature or revelation; delighting in the starry heavens and the verdant fields, and in the story of redemption, where the love of God is revealed. In these displays of Deity there is no attribute on which it does not love to dwell. This is the religion of poetry and of philosophy.

2. The religion of forms, that began in the early ages of the church to introduce the rights and ceremonies of heathenism into the Christian Church, and despite of the Reformation, that for a season checked the tendency, there is a constant inclination to relapse into it again.

3. The religion of feeling, that estimates the value of religion by the amount of excitement it produces; it makes happiness the gauge of piety, and the facility of shedding tears the evidence of repentance, and joy the proof of conversion.

4. The religion of PRINCIPLE has some things in common with all these kinds of religion, but differs from them all. It embraces an intellectual adoption of right as a rule of action, and a steadfast adherance to it. It finds its authority not in whims or custom, or even the laws of men, but in the will of God, and does what is right and true, come what may. It makes the greatest sacrifices, and performs the most heroic deeds, not to be emblazoned among men, or canonized when dead, but because it is right and God wills it.

PRISON INMATES.

The following touching reflections are from the Brunswick Fredonian. They deserve to be written in letters of gold and universally read.

There were nine hundred and seventy-nine persons in Sing-Sing prison last week, of whom seventy-six were females. So it is stated in the newspapers. Such paragraphs are too often read with a "Well, what of it?" air and feeling. But there are some who pause in thoughtfulness at such a statement. Every one of those nine hundred wretched persons was once an infant, and smiled in its vague dream of joy as it fed itself asleep on its mother's bosom. Every one of them awakened love in some less or larger circle of related hearts, and was cared for and cherished. Perhaps some one might have been found who would have died for it, nay, that did die for it. For that mother perished; or the manly father, pitted unequally against poverty and misfortune, broke the overstrained heart-string. Take the sternest, and hardest in the multitude, and somewhere in his bosom are wrapped up household memories, souvenirs of love, gleams and glimpses of innocence, and miniature plans and picturings of hope. Seventy-six of them are women. They have been, then, to say the least, some rudimental elements of that creature who in society performs the office of sister, wife, mother, friend; sheds grace, softness and a beautiful glory over this life, and charms it with sweet amenities and a divine charity. Sing-Sing is not a boudoir, a lady's chamber, a drawing room, a parlor, a hall room. It is a prison; and grace, virtue, of any sort or degree, does not abide in prisons, but in good society and free decorated quarters. Alas! alas! let us hope a little otherwise. There is a charity, not forbidden, which hopeth all things; which, like Midas's fingers, turneth what it touches to gold; which findeth what it seeketh. And could we be brought to explore even Sing-Sing in the right mind, we might oft-times discover fragments of nobility and germs of goodness, and find that though all is tarnished, all is not utterly corroded and destroyed. But we fear our charity runneth not this way with any market current. In few words, when men commit those sins of which prisons are cognizant, we are done with them. Their probation is over; they are ruined; and however God may regard them, by man they are abandoned. They may wish to return to the paths of virtue, but we warn them off; that path is appropriated to better people. O for some Howards and Frys, in these times of vaunting benevolence, to visit with an enlarged spirit of love and hope, the prisoner, the outcast, the rejected of men!

The Rev. Dr. Rippon was pastor of the Baptist church, Carter Lane, Tooley st., London, for a period of sixty-three years.

Dr. John Gill was his predecessor, who remained with the church about fifty years.

In this day of mutation, it is almost as rare to find a pastor who has been with a single church the space of fifty years as its settled pastor, as we suppose it to have been in the days of Dr. Gill to find pastors making frequent changes from one church to another. The example of Drs. Gill and Rippon, may be profitable to many in the present day, who being "unstable as water, cannot excel."

PREACHING CHRIST.

It was the business of the Apostles to preach Christ; and when He was preached, by whatever persons and for whatever reasons, they rejoiced therein. It is possible, however, so to present Him as to leave an unjust impression of his character, and to produce but little effect upon the hearer. Several things are indispensable to the true and effective preaching of Christ.

1. He must be so exhibited as to show the deadly nature and awful consequences of sin. The exceeding sinfulness of sin is seen only in connection with its effects, and in contrast with holiness. When Christ's agony in the garden and on the cross is exhibited as the deadly but just penalty of man's disobedience; when his holiness and perfections are so presented as to show the real depravity and consequent danger of man—the hardest heart cannot remain unmoved, but will receive a deep and lasting impression.

2. He must be exhibited as an all-sufficient sacrifice. A penitent, under a just view of his sins and danger, can place no reliance upon himself; neither can he find peace in looking to one concerning whose merits there is the least doubt. He must have such a view of Christ, that when he asks, "What shall I do to be saved?" he can look with confidence to the Lord Jesus Christ, as "able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him."

3. He must be exhibited as one who has magnified the law and made it honorable. If he be represented as having delivered us from obligation to obey the law, instead of delivering us from the curse of the law, the sinner never realizes his lost condition, nor earnestly lays hold on Christ's obedience as his ground of hope. Right views on this point, therefore, are fundamental to sound religious character. Those who have right views here, will exhibit in their lives all the graces of the Christian, while such as are in error will be cast about by every wind of doctrine, being unstable in all their ways, and never excelling.

4. He must be exhibited as a pattern for imitation. We are assured that "Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps." We are commanded to beware of those who spoil "after the traditions of men, and not after Christ." And we are told, that "if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his." There is no incentive to faithfulness, obedience, and the discharge of every religious duty, more powerful than that which is found in the example of Christ. This example is adapted to every condition, and all the circumstances of life. It embodies in a living form the principles and spirit of that gospel which makes wise unto salvation.

If Christ be so preached as to show the malignity of sin, to present a sufficient sacrifice for sin, to magnify the law of God, and furnish a perfect example for imitation, we need not fear that such preaching will be in vain.

THE PROTESTANT PRINCIPLE.

That was a glorious doctrine of the Protestant Churches, that "the Scriptures are the only judge, the only Rule of Faith." It decided the question about which Papacy had long disputed, and furnished a test by which all dogmas might be tried. Well were it if Protestants had always adhered to that maxim. It would have been to them a wall of defence, against which nothing could prevail. But such is the aversion of men to the simple doctrines of the Bible, that there is a constant tendency to descend from this high position, and to seek for instruction among the traditions of men. And whenever the propriety of this is allowed in any one point, a door is opened for numberless errors in other points. It has been thus in regard to the change of the Sabbath. Almost all the Protestant churches have adopted the custom of observing the first day of the week instead of the seventh, without any specific authority from the Scriptures for doing so. Hence Catholic writers have again and again charged them with denying their principles in their own practice. Proof of this may be found in every discussion which has ever been had between a Protestant and a Catholic. Even in their catechisms for primary instruction, they assert, that "the power of the Church to command feasts and holy days" is proved "by this very act of changing the Sabbath into Sunday, which Protestants allow of; and therefore they fondly contradict themselves by keeping Sunday so strictly, and breaking most other feasts commanded by the same church;"—"because, by keeping Sunday they acknowledge the Churnh's power to ordain Sabbath, and to command them under sin, and by not keeping the feasts by her commanded, they again deny the same power." Here, then, we have Protestant practice arrayed against the Protestant principle; and by reference to the inconsistency, the Papist shields himself against the force of rebuke. If the outcry now raised against papal domination, was accompanied by a practical return to the Protestant principle, some good might be expected. As it is, however, every rebuke will be met by the reply, "Physician, heal thyself."

EFFECTIVE COMPOSITION.

An eminent divine, in speaking of the almost unprecedented popularity of his published discourses, said he attributed it to the fact, that during the last years of his life, he spent much of his time in pruning and re-writing them. Every sentence which was not necessary to exhibit the thought, was erased; every word which did not express his exact meaning, gave place to one better chosen. Hence, in reading those discourses, one's attention is wholly occupied with the truth they reveal, which is presented so clearly as not to be misunderstood, and so free from ornament as not to have its natural effect weakened. Here is the secret of effective composition. It aims to exhibit the thought, rather than the dress of thought; to reach the heart, rather than to puzzle and astonish the head. There are very few thinkers, who might not, by proper care, present their thoughts in such a form as to produce effect; but there are thousands who profess to think, and do actually write, yet for want of such care fail to produce any lasting effect. If those who boast of the number of their volumes, or of the rapidity with which these volumes were written, would think more and write less, the result of their labors would be greatly increased. Some men deserve more credit for the things they do not write, than others for the things they do write.

THE NESTORIAN MISSION.

The New York American, some two weeks since, published an extract of a letter, dated Constantinople, August 28, 1844, stating that the mission at Ooroomiah had been broken up by the Nestorians themselves, with Mar Yohannan at their head. It stated, likewise, that Mar Shimon, the Patriarch, had determined to expel the Americans from the country; and gave as a reason, that while the Nestorians have often begged to have the Scriptures printed for them, the missionaries have been constantly making and printing books of their own, preaching to them about leaving off their fasts.

This report, which has been extensively circulated, and has awakened very serious apprehensions, arose, as it now appears, from a difference between the missionaries and two brothers of the Patriarch, on account of which the brothers sought to disband the schools, and to suspend all missionary operations for a year. This attempt, however, was firmly and successfully resisted by the missionaries; and thus the whole difficulty was brought to a clos. It is true that the Papists have endeavored to throw some obstacles in the way of the missionaries; but nothing so serious as the report represented has ever occurred. It was magnified by coming through an unfriendly and false medium.

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

The New York Express has received files of papers from these islands to the 1st of July. The temperance cause is prospering there. A brig arrived there in June with 2500 gallons of brandy on board, of which she only sold five gallons. When the vessel departed, the mate left $5 for the temperance cause, requesting that the donation might be publicly acknowledged.

The American missionaries had held a general meeting, which closed on the 1st of July.

Several deaths of Americans have recently occurred. Among them we notice that of Mrs. Dole, wife of Rev. Daniel Dole, principal of the Mission Boarding School.

We copy the following from the True Sun:

"It may be interesting to state, that the first missionaries to the Sandwich Islands sailed from Boston in October, 1819. They arrived at Hawaii in March, 1820. In April, 1820, the King and chiefs consented to their landing. Since that time 61 males and 67 females have joined the mission from the United States. The amount of money paid for the support of these missionaries has been $608,865, and all by the American Board of foreign missions, except $50,000 by the American Bible Society, and $19,365 by the American Tract Socity.

"There are eighteen missionary stations, and forty permanent dwellings, besides two printing offices, seminaries and school houses, built by the natives, &c. The result has been in part that Christianity has been introduced and adopted as the religious system of the nation. The language has been reduced to writing. Three separate editions of the New Testament, of ten thousand copies each, have been issued from the press, making thirty thousand copies; one duodecimo edition of the whole Bible, of ten thousand copies, and the purchase and circulation of a great many miscellaneous works. All elementary school books and scientific and miscellaneous works, have been issued at the expense of the American Board. Schools have been established, and nearly one-half of the adult population taught to read. At present the schools are mostly confined to children, about twenty thousand of whom are gathered into them in the different parts of the islands."

CHEERING NEWS FROM BURMAH.

The following information is taken from a letter written by Mrs. Abbot, one of the Baptist Missionaries in Burmah, to Mrs. Kincaid. The letter is dated Sandoway, May 18, 1844, and reached this country by the overland mail to England. We copy from the Baptist Record:

"The good work continues to prosper among the Karens, both in Arracan and Burmah. Mr. A. made two tours to the southern churches this season, during which he with the native pastor baptized about eighty converts. Since which Ko Shyat Kyou, has made a tour into Burmah, visiting the little churches, counselling and encouraging the assistants, adjusting difficulties, and baptizing converts. He appears to have had a very good and successful time in this missionary tour. We have not seen him since his return to his station at Magessan, but Mr. A. has just received a letter from him, in which he says that 'through the grace of Jesus Christ, he has bapiized ONE THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED AND FIFTY.' We are anxiously waiting to hear from his own mouth, the particulars of his labors. I think I wrote you that this man died of cholera last year. This was the report, and we believing it, spread the intelligence, and I saw a notice of it in the Maulmein Religious Herald. After we had mourned his loss for some weeks, thinking it a mysterious Providence, he appeared, much to our surprise and joy, in person, and corrected our misinformation. He is a sterling man, and God grant that he may long live to labor in that cause which he so much loves.

"He and Tuoy Po, baptized a good many after their ordination in December and January 1842-43, previous to Mr. A.'s visit to the south last December, how many I cannot now say, but as many as two or three hundred at least. You must not suppose that because the baptisms have been so much more numerous the past year, that there must have been an uncommon outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Probably the majority of those baptized in Burmah, have been Christians for many years, but had never before an opportunity of being baptized."

LOUIS PHILIPPE'S OPINION OF WAR.

The views of this influential monarch are seen in the following extract from his reply to an address of the Peace Society. How easy it would be, by the combined influence of a few leading monarchs, to put an end to war, with the untold evils which always attend it. We hope the recent friendly greetings which have taken place in England will be productive of happy results in this respect. Hear Louis Philippe:—

"I am happy to receive these addresses, and feel particularly gratified to find that our American friends should do justice to the pains I have taken to maintain the general peace of Europe. There is no advantage in making war, even when a nation has attained the object for which it has fought, because ultimately the losses are always greater than the gains. I have ever professed that principle: when I was in America, forty years ago, I was often asked to propose toasts at public dinners, and I almost invariably expressed the wish that universal and permanent peace should exist among all nations. I was then exiled from my country, and my anxious desire was that it should enjoy peace and happiness. This is what caused me to adopt that salutary precept. I could not then foresee that I should be called upon one day to exert my influence and act myself in favor of that great cause. May the Almighty accord me the maintenance of peace! War appears to me a malediction; and war in Europe, between civilized nations, I regard as an absurdity; if the smaller States desired it, we should prevent them, and as peace between the great powers becomes daily more consolidated, I hope if I live a few years longer, that a general war in Europe will have become impossible."

For the Recorder.

THE MISSIONARY'S CLOSET.

It is a lovely scene. The sun has sunk behind the western hills, shedding his glorious light on vale and mountain, gilding the landscape with a hue of livid brightness. The pensive stream glides silently along amid sheltering hills, with scarce a ripple on its surface. The hues of flickering light fast fade from its bright surface, leaving it shrouded in sunless majesty. The soft murmuring of the gentle breeze is heard among the multitude of boughs, waking the deep music of the soul, and calling forth the aspirations to Nature's God.

Mark ye that child of God? With countenance serene, with calm and placid brow, with measured tread, in holy musing mood, he bends his steps towards the forest glen. He enters the dark ravine, and in the deep recess of shade, he finds his closet. The trees spread their green branches over him, as if to shield his head from gathering storm. No sounds disturb his calm retreat, save when some warbling songster twitters its farewell notes, or murmuring insects chime their evening lay. Here, far from the busy haunts of life, he holds communion with his Maker.

His heart is pained, his soul is burdened with the worth of souls. He knows that man possesses an immortal part that shall not die; either in weal or woe, his doom forever must be fixed. He longs to snatch him from the eternal burnings—and his heart, overcharged with grief, puts up a fervent prayer for the impenitent. He cries, "O God! must sinners perish, while bleeding Mercy opens wide her arms, and calls, 'Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters?' Forbid it, holy Father!—grant that all may come to thee and live." He knows the path of disobedience well, for once he trod the road to ruin. But he paused, and looked around him; the silent teachings of the Spirit told him there was a hereafter. He looked into the mighty universe, and witnessed things sublime. Nature's Book spread out before him, presents a great First Cause, from which these hosts of wonders had their origin. He looked into the Book of Revelation, and he learned the author of these noble works to be an omniscient, self-existent being, the great eternal God; that he formed man in image like himself, a being pure and sinless as his Maker; He placed before him good and evil, the power of chosing for himself, and taught him the result of disobedience. Man transgressed, and fell from his primeval state of purity, lost the favor of his Creator, and was forever doomed to endless ruin. But the Father sent his Son to die for guilty man. The great Redeemer came to earth, and was despised, rejected, suffered death, that whosoever would might come to him and live. His soul is moved; he heeds the call of wisdom, submits to God, and now his peace is like a river.

In the Book of Inspiration, he reads the Saviour's mandate, Go forth and spread the news of gospel grace among all nations; tell them that whosoever will believe the words of life, and do the will of God, shall have his love and mercy here, and in the world to come, life everlasting. Go bear the Cross; go suffer the reproach of Christ; be faithful unto death, and yours shall be a crown of life. He reads the message, and it falls upon his heart like words of fire. In his musings, he hears the whispering of the Spirit, bidding him go forth and call the alien to his home, the wanderer to his rest. His soul is filled with burning zeal; his heart with holy ardor glows; and in the strength of Israel's God he leaves his friends and home, and throws himself upon the mercy of a reckless world. The foxes have their hiding places, the birds that cheer the laborer with their songs have nests, but he, like his divine Redeemer, hath not where to lay his head.

JEWISH SCHOOLS.

We find in the last number of the Occident, a proposition for the establishment of Hebrew Public Schools, where children can be educated in accordance with the Jewish faith, without being compelled to listen to the reading and expounding of other religious tenets. This suggestion is made without complaint in regard to the existing public school system, and without any disposition to disturb the operation of that system. It is simply for the purpose of promoting among Israelites a thorough education, and especially in those branches which are characteristic of their nation. In the Hebrew language particularly, they are anxious that progress should be made. Multiplied are the inducements to a thorough study of this language. The probability that it is the language in which the Almighty spoke to Adam, and the fact that it is the medium through which the most important truths have been conveyed to men, ought to give interest to its study by persons of all religious professions. But among the Jews it has a superior importance from the fact that it is the exclusive language of the fathers of their nation, and the language of their synagogue worship. We are glad, therefore, to see the growing interest in its study.

STATISTICS OF EDUCATION AND BENEVOLENCE.

A friend has sent us the following statistics, which he says have been prepared with care, and may therefore be relied upon. The statistics of education show a gratifying increase of collegiate students, but a mournful decrease of theological students. The receipts of the different benevolent societies are given in round numbers, and indicate a gradual but slow increase.

FIGULUS.

ROBERT TAYLOR, formerly known as a ringleader in infidelity, recently died in France at the age of 57 years. He was in early life a clergyman of the Episcopal Church. After abandoning that church, he assisted to establish infidel lectures in London, where, on one occasion, he dressed himself in clerical robes, and officiated at a burlesque celebration of the Lord's Supper, thus attempting to amuse his auditors by administering the bread and wine amidst their laughs and jeers. His address and manners were so captivating as to draw hundreds of persons around him, over whose minds he exerted a destructive influence. For a time his efforts were stayed by his imprisonment. It is now said, that he returned to the doctrines of the Episcopal Church some time previous to his death. If so, his last hours must have been occupied with awful recollections, and afford another proof that the way of the transgressor is hard.

PRESBYTERIANISM VS. EPISCOPACY.—The recent appointment of several missionary bishops of the Episcopal Church has called forth rather severe remarks from some leading Presbyterian journals. One of the newly appointed bishops, Rev. Horatio Southgate, has been for a long time charged with hostility to the missions of the American Board in the east. He has several times accused the missionaries with leaving an impression that they were bishops, wearing the clerical dress, and using the prayer book of the Episcopal Church. At the late meeting of the Episcopal Board, Mr Southgate's course was approved, and he himself was made a "bishop." This is regarded by some as identifying the whole Episcopal Church with his hostility, and of course serves to widen the breach between the two denominations. If these disputes had reference to some points about which there is a "Thus saith the Lord," they might be entitled to attention. But carried on, as they are, among those who neglect the "weightier matters of law," it is difficult to awaken much interest in them.

BAPTISM.—A Baptist missionary in the Cherokee country, under date of August 12, writes as follows:—"Yesterday, a native Methodist preacher, and twelve of his members, presented themselves as candidates for baptism, on a conscientious conviction of the truth, produced by reading the sacred word in their own language. This is altogether a spontaneous movement among themselves, as neither myself nor any of my members had any idea of it, till I received a note from the preacher on the subject last week. Twelve were received, and are expected to be baptized."

DIVISION.—The recent refusal of the Baptist Home Mission Board to appoint a slave holding missionary, has called forth some severe remarks from the South. The Executive Committee of the Georgia Convention have published a long article on the subject, in which they say, "The rejection of our application goes far to evince the necessity of a southern organization for our benevolent operations." Here, then, in a modified form, is a proposition for a division among the Baptists, unless southern feeling is consulted. We apprehend, however, that it will end like the threats of southern politicians to dissolve the union.

IRELAND.—Rev. J. D. Smith, missionary in Ireland, reports that a salutary change has taken place in that country, which is now open to the gospel as preached by Protestants. The people readily attend the meetings which are held, and many have left the Roman church to join Protestant churches.

"CHRISTIAN SABBATH" DISCUSSION.—We copy the following item from the Perfectionist, (Putney, Vt.,) of the 16th inst.:—

"On Friday evening of last week the 'Philomathic Institute' (alias Lyceum) in this village, discussed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the observance of the Christian Sabbath is of perpetual obligation on all men.

The house was well filled, and the debate was interesting. At the close the Chairman gave his decision in favor of the negative; and, on an appeal to the Society, this decision was sustained."

SUNDAY IN BOSTON.

The following account of a meeting in Boston on a Sunday evening, is given by Wm. Lloyd Garrison. It makes one think of the reply of a very pious deacon to the suggestion, that there was no occasion for being so strict about Sunday-keeping, since the Scriptures did not enjoin it. "So much the more reason," said he, "why we should be strict." But to the extract:—

"In the evening of the same day, I went to the Marlboro' Chapel to hear Mr. Green, the reformed gambler, relate his experience, and unfold the mysteries of gambling, in order that some efficient means may be adopted to check the progress of that dreadful vice. Mr. Gough made some excellent remarks in relation to gambling and temperance, but felt necessitated to argue that these were topics, the consideration of which was not inconsistent with the Sabbath! The Rev. Mr. Chapin also spoke in an eloquent manner, but he also had to frame a sabbatical justification for the occasion! Deacon Moses Grant, with a very long face, reminded the audience that it would be highly improper for them to give any audible expression to their feelings, as it was Sunday evening; and he proceeded to say that, as it was Sunday evening, Mr. Green would take some other occasion, (a secular Tuesday or Thursday evening,) on which to exhibit the tricks of gamesters, their marked cards, &c. Poor Mr. Green, therefore, was rendered wholly useless on that occasion, though the public were invited, at ninepence a head, to come and hear him tell his eventful story, and see him perform his experiments.

"A great multitude of facts, of a similar kind, might be adduced, all going to prove how all-pervading and deplorable is the superstition which abounds in regard to the first day of the week, falsely styled 'the Sabbath.'"

General Intelligence.

FROM MEXICO.—Papers have been received at New Orleans to the 26th ult. The most important intelligence relates to a severe contest between the Mexicans and the Comanche and Tahuacanos Indians.

The latter would appear to have made an incursion among the Mexicans and carried off a large number of women and children. We have not the particulars of this fight, unfortunately, but it must have been very severe, as we have a list of the names of 46 Mexicans killed upon the field, and 22 wounded. This fight occurred some time prior to the 9th of October, near the Paso de los Moros, in the district or precinct of Reynosa. Cotemporary with this at the rancho of Los Moros, 22 were shot or burned in the house attached to the ranho, and many women and chiidren carried off captives.

On the 17th of October another engagement took place. There were, according to Mexican accounts, upwards of four hundred Indians engaged in this. The affair lasted over two hours, a lively fire being kept up all the while. The Indians then abandoned the field, giving up fifty-five Mexicans, women and children, whom they had previously carried off captives, a quantity of fire-arms, and some horses, which they had stolen. Twenty of the Indians were left dead upon the field, while many more were believed to have been carried off in the fight, according to Indian usage, both dead and wounded. On the side of the Mexicans nine were killed and thirty-four wounded.

THE LATE POLITICAL CONTEST.—The editor of the Philadelphia Sun, in speaking of the late contest, makes the following appropriate remarks:—

"Speculation is now over. The question is apparently decided. James K. Polk will be the next President of these United States. Now is the time, then, for all parties to show their republicanism. Whether Whig or Democrat, past asperities should be forgotten, and all strive alike for the public good. We often think it a consoling reflection, amid the growing disorganization of this land, that, after our tremendous political excitements, we settle down, as a people, into such comparative quiet. There are no outbreaks, and but few discontents. Such an agitation as this country has experienced during the last six months, would have rocked any European community to its centre, nor after the waters had subsided, would it have ceased to exhibit terrible marks of the deluge. But here, when once it is known what candidate is chosen, his opponents good-humoredly make the best of their defeat, and join with their late antagonists in putting their shoulders to the wheel for the common good. It is always thus where the people govern."

CONFLICT WITH A MAD DOG.—Mr. Happoldt, of this city, met with a great misfortune a week or two since, in the loss of a fine pointer by hydrophobia, and under circumstances of uncommon peril to himself. After shooting until past mid-day, observing that his dog became disobedient, and exhibited a suspicions repugnance to water, he tied it with a handkerchief to a sapling, leaned his gun against a tree, and ate his luncheon a few yards off. On returning toward his gun, he found the dog, evidently mad, in the act of tearing itself loose and making at him. Without being able to reach his gun, Mr. H. ran into some water near, and stood on a log until the dog had gone out of sight. He was then returning for his gun, when suddenly the dog rushed upon him over a hillock, and he only escaped being bitten by seizing the rabid animal by the throat. A struggle ensued between them for more than half an hour, requiring the exertion of all the muscular power of the assailed, while the dog mangled its tongue dreadfully, and covered Mr. H. with foam and blood. He at last succeeded in getting off his belt, putting it around the dog's neck, and buckling it to the stem of a small bush; he then regained his gun, and shot the dog. Mr. H., though he fortunately escaped without a scratch, was much exhausted, and the muscles of his arms were swollen from the exertion for two days after. [Charleston Mercury.

ANCIENT LEGISLATION IN VIRGINIA.—We are not aware that Virginia originally had a complete code of "Blue Laws," but the old settlers must have had some queer notions about legislation. For example, the divulger of false news or rumors was subject to a fine of 2,000 lbs. of tobacco. An act was passed in 1662 for the spiritual profit of "schismatical persons," who, "either out of averseness to the orthodox established religion, or out of the new-fangled conceits of their own heretical inventions, refused to have their children baptized." It provided that every person who when it was in his power, refused to carry his child to a lawful minister to have it baptized, should be "amerced two thousand pounds of tobacco; half to the parish, half to the informer." Tobacco has been applied to many uses, but to none more remarkable than the enforcing of Pedobaptism. There was another act of the same date, we believe, which savored little of the gallantry on which modern Virginians plume themselves. The preamble sets forth that "many babbling women slander and scandalize their neighbors, for which their poor husbands are often involved in chargeable and vexatious suits." The act provided, that "in actions of slander, occasioned by the wife, after judgment passed for damages, the woman shall be punished by Ducking." If the damages were greater than five hundred pounds of tobacco, she was to have the benefit of a Ducking for each five hundred pounds adjudged against the husband, if he should refuse to pay the tobacco. Under such a law, the presumption is, that the land enjoyed quite a rest from "babbling," during the colder months of the year. In summer the penalty would be rather a pleasure. Had women enjoyed a right of suffrage, the law would doubtless have been so framed as to apply to male babblers. Our ancestors thought legislation could accomplish everything—it could make men dress with propriety, behave genteely, and believe most orthodoxly. We laugh at their absurdities; but our children will perhaps be no less astonished at ours. [Cincinnati Herald.

NEWSPAPERS IN WISCONSIN.—There are now thirteen newspapers published in Wisconsin—five Whig, six Democratic, one Abolition, and one Neutral. Four of the number are published West, and nine East of Rock River. The population of Wisconsin does not at present much exceed the number in some of the largest Counties in the State of New York; yet no one County in New York (except the City) supports within its limits any thing near the number of papers which are sustained in this Territory. City papers at the East are as well patronized in the West, in proportion to population, as they are in any other portion of the country. The inference therefore may be fairly drawn, that the inhabitants of Wisconsin are a reading people; that they are not behind the age, at least so far as the means of acquiring a knowledge of passing events is concerned. [Southport (Wis.) Herald.

CORN-STALK SUGAR.—Mr. John Bead, of New Harmony, Ia. has made 395 lbs. of good Sugar this season from the corn stalks that grew on three quarters of an acre. This is at the rate of 500 lbs. per acre. Mr. B. made 50 lbs. in a day, with a simple apparatus of his own construction. Five hundred pounds at 4 cents per pound amount to $20 per acre. It would have produced say fifty bushels of corn, at 25 cents, or $15 50

RIGHTEOUS RETRIBUTION.—An evil disposed person at a camp-meeting, remarked to his companions that his jack-knife felt very much as though it wanted to cut up one of these Methodist harnesses.—One of the company said he would bring to him one if he would cut it to pieces, upon which the first declared he would. Away went the smart fellow to bring the harness, and soon after returned with one, upon which the brave chap with the restless jack-knife redeemed the vow, by cutting the harness until it lay in ruins at his feet. But alas for the evil doer! when the truth was known, it was found that his mischievous jack-knife had displayed its love of doing evil upon his own harness, and he was compelled to bear the loss as best he could. [True Wesleyan.

REWARDS OF AMERICAN GENIUS.—It is stated that Mr. Coleman's invention, styled the "Æolian Attachment to the Piano," which he sold in this country to Messrs. Nunns & Clark, and others, for $100,000 for his right in the United States, is well received in England. He has secured patents in England and France, and the attention of the musical world has been directed to it by the great admiration it has excited in the court and fashionable circles of London. The pianist of the Queen and other professors have expressed their wonder and surprise at such an invention, particularly as it comes from America. They say that the whole of Europe has been aiming at the same thing and had given it up in despair.

REMARKABLE.—In Doyleston (Pa,) Beniah Holdren, an aged man of 94 years, after partaking of a happy meal with his children, apparently in perfect health, observed: "Now, my friends, this is the last meal I shall ever eat; I am about to die." He then proceeded to give directions as to his worldly concerns, his burial, &c., and when he had concluded was struck down by a paralytic stroke. [Doyleston Whig.

GUNPOWDER NULLIFIED.—It is a singular fact that a French officer has discovered a method of taking away the explosive properties of gunpowder, to be restored at pleasure. It is merely to mix the powder with finely powdered charcoal, or black lead, filling up the interstices between the grains; and if in this state it is set fire to, it merely fuses, and does not flame. In a recent experiment, two barrels of the powder thus mixed, were placed one upon the other, and the lower one lighted. It burnt in about twenty minutes, but the caloric developed had so little force, that the upper barrel was but lightly charred, and its contents uninjured. The powder is at any time rendered serviceable by sifting it.

DEATH OF AN INDIAN CHIEF.—The Quebec Mercury of the 5th records the decease of Nicholas Vincent, Chief of the Huron tribe of Indians settled at Lorette. He had attained the age of 75 years, and was much respected. He was the nephew of the preceding chief, and succeeded to the government of the tribe by election, as customary among the Hurons.

Vincent was one of the four chiefs who visited England in 1825, and received from George IV. a large silver gilt medal.

WESLEYAN AND EPISCOPAL METHODISTS.—It may not be generally known, that quite a large secession from the Episcopal Methodist Church has taken place, which is now arrayed under the title of Wesleyan Methodists. They held their first General Conference at Cleveland a short time since, and remained in session nine days. The principal points of difference between the two bodies are, 1. The Wesleyans admit laymen, as members, to their Annual and General Conference; the Episcopal Methodists exclude them entirely. 2. Among the Wesleyans the people are permitted, to some extent, to elect their ministers; among the Episcopal Methodists they are appointed by the Bishops. 3. The Wesleyans have no Bishops. The rules require all members to adopt the principles of anti-slavery and total abstinence from the use and traffic in ardent spirits. They are about to establish a paper and a Book Concern in the City of New York; and the True Wesleyan, a paper which has been hitherto published by Rev. O. Scott, is to be transferred to New York.

COLORED MEMBERS IN THE BAPTIST CHURCHES IN GEORGIA.—The Georgia Christian Index says:—From the best information I can obtain, I am inclined to think that out of 60,000 communicants, 45,000 are black persons. In the Church of Augusta, he says, "there are about 1,000 blacks and 200 whites, being as 5 to 1. In Savannah, 2,500 blacks to about 300 whites, being 8 to 1. In most of the southern counties," he resumes, "the proportion is still greater."

WHAT EDUCATION DOES.—At an anniversary, I once heard a brother give an illustration of what education does for the Minister, which had both point and edge. "Education," said he, "is to the mind, what the grindstone is to the scythe. It neither improves the temper of the steel, nor adds to its amount, but some how or other it makes it cut.

KINDNESS.—The humble current of little kindnesses, which, though but a creeping streamlet, yet incessantly flows, although it glides in silent secrecy within the domestic walls, and along the walks of private life, and makes neither appearance nor noise in the world, proves in the end a more copious tribute unto the stores of human comfort and felicity, than any sudden transient flood of detached bounty, however ample, that may rush into it with a mighty sound.

SLAVE STATE REPRESENTATION.—The Presidential vote of 1840 presented the relative strength of the Free and the Slave States in the following manner.

	Popular Vote.		Electoral Vote.
Free States	1,72	139	171
Slave States	73	367	123

It will be seen at a glance that the ratio of the popular vote is very different from that of the Electoral vote. In other words, the Slave States have many more of the Electoral votes than the proportion of population would give. Six thousand voters in the Slave States have the same voice in choosing the President, as ten thousand voters it the Free States.

SUMMARY.

The demand in England for American fruit is likely to become a matter of considerable importance. A large quantity of apples were sent there last season, and paid well. Many orchards of five, ten, and twenty thousand trees have lately been planted in the Hudson River Counties, with a view of growing apples for export to foreign countries.

Several negro men, owned by citizens of St. Louis, eloped from that city a few weeks ago, and have not since been heard of.

The late James Dowes, of Newark, left by his will the house and lot on which he resides, to the American Board of Foreign Missions. The property is valued at $5,000.

Agricultural implements have been discovered among the Chinese, which were supposed to be only known to European and American nations, such as plows, common harrows, winnowing, and even threshing machines. Added to these, there is no considerable field which does not possess its chain pump for the purpose of watering the crops from the lower levels, with small labor to themselves.

A building in Utica, occupied by H. Hollister, as a drug store, was destroyed by fire on the 14th. Loss, $30,000. Insured.

At Massat, in France, on the 20th ultimo, two females, mother and daughter, gave birth to a male child within two minutes of each other. The babies were put into one cradle whilst the mothers were attended to, and the result was an impossibility to distinguish which was the uncle and which was the nephew.

We are informed that Mr. Van Rensselaer has gone to Bristol, Pennsylvania, to enable him to commence a suit in the U. S. Supreme Court against the State of New York for damages, for the non enforcement of the law in the collection of rents due from his tenants. A citizen cannot sue the State of which he is a citizen, and hence the removal of Mr. Van Rensselaer to Pennsylvania.

On Saturday evening the 10th inst., the Democrats of Poundridge procured a cannon to fire a salute in honor of their late political victory in that State, and after two or three discharges, while ramming home a cartridge the charge blew out, badly wounding two men.

The workmen have discontinued their labors on the spire of Trinity Church until Spring, and have removed the scaffolding. For several months the men have been at work on the top, "high in air." When the spire is finished it will be about two hundred and eighty feet in height. It is now completed two hundred and thirty feet, and will be finished early in the next season. The work, as it now appears, is a most beautiful specimen of architecture.

The value of the ground, four acres, buildings, instruments, &c. is about $25,000.

The Wesleyan Methodists of England have dissolved their connection with the Established Church; and have adopted a resolution wishing success to the operations of the "Anti-State Church Association."

A dumb pupil in Paris being asked, "What is eternity?" replied, "the life time of the Almighty."

What a beautiful lesson is taught in these words of Sterne: "So quickly sometimes has the wheel turned round, that many a man has lived to enjoy the benefit of that charity which his own piety projected."

THE BEST MEN, says a profound writer, are those who preserve the boy in them as long as they live. Age should not destroy the child. The child is the original, and man is merely a superstructure of the boy. It is an unfortunate sign for a man's happiness, when he has forgotten his boyish feelings.

BUCKWHEAT CAKES.—As this is the season for buckwheat cakes, the following recipe will now be invaluable to those who are fond of them; a friend, who has tried the experiment, says it makes decidedly better cakes, with half the trouble necessary in the usual mode of raising them with yeast:—To three pints of buckwheat flour mixed into a batter, add one teaspoonful of carbonate of soda, dissolved in water; add one ditto of tartaric acid, dissolved in like manner; first apply the carbonate, stir the batter well, then put in the acid; thus the use of yest is entirely superceded, and cakes "as light as a feather" are insured. One great advantage is, that the batter is ready for baking as soon as it is made. [Columbia Spy.

POTATO CHEESE.—Boil good white potatoes, peel them, and when cold, mash them until not the least lump remains. To five pounds of this, add one pint of sour milk, and as much salt as you think suitable. Work it well, and cover it, letting it remain three or four days, according to the season; then knead it again—make the cheeses the size you like, and dry them in the shade. Put them in layers in large pots or kegs, and let them remain for a fortnight. They will be good for years, if kept in close vessels in a dry place.

JAMES TALLMADGE, on the Commercial Policy of England, affecting the interests of American Agriculture," is the title of a pamphlet published by the American Institute, containing the substance of an Address delivered at the opening of the Agricultural Convention in New York, Oct. 11, 1844. The Address discusses pretty thoroughly the question of free trade, and embodies much valuable information on the subject.

RECOGNITION OF FRIENDS IN HEAVEN.

Rev. Daniel Sharp, of Boston, has published a discourse on this subject, full of encouragement and consolation to the bereaved. The text is 1 Cor. 3: 12, the discussion of which is arranged under the following heads:—

I. It is reasonable, in the first place, to suppose that the righteous know each other in the future state.

II. That departed Christians are acquainted with each other may be inferred, in the second place, from the capacity which angels possess of distinguishing between different individuals on earth.

III. We are also confirmed in this persuasion, in the third place, from the account which is given of the transfiguration of our Saviour.

IV. In the fourth place, that inspired men looked forward to a re-union beyond the grave with those who were dear to them in this life, is certain.

V. Consider, in the last place, that so far from its being improbable that believers will know each other in heaven, it is plainly intimated that they will even know the souls that are lost.

THE WANDERER.

BY D. C. COLESWORTHY.

Return, once more, return,
Thou youthful wanderer;
The path of happiness discern,
Nor longer vice prefer.
Come, and thou shalt be blest—
The past shall be forgot—
The warm out-gushings of the heart,
O spurn—O spurn them not.

Return, and joy will spring
With gladness in the heart;
What if thou hast been wandering
From all thy friends apart?
Who will reproach thee now?
Who thy past life recall?
Will not the sunshine on thy brow,
Make us forget it all?

Return, we love thee yet—
Here thou hast still a place,
Where, warmly greeted, thou'lt forget
Thy sorrow and disgrace.
The smile of love will cheer,
The falling tear restore,
For thou art unto us most dear—
O, do not wander more.

We know thou canst not stay;
We read it on thy cheek;
Though vice still beckons thee away,
Thou'lt hear thy conscience speak.
Thou wilt to us return—
Again rejoice at home—
And love will in the bosom burn,
To see the wanderer come.

Here by our side how sweet
Will all the moments roll,
Where pleasant friends will come to greet
The lost but ransomed soul,
And in the prayer unite
In thanks to Him who led
The wanderer to the path of light—
Restored him from the dead.

PLANTING TREES.

Reader, have you not some vacant spot in your orchard, some nook in your garden, some unplanted road side, some unoccupied place in your yard, where some trees might be planted to advantage? Look around and see if there is not room for some, or perhaps many, of the kinds useful for timber, or their fruit, or ornamental purposes. It is possible you attended to this matter fully last spring, but the chances are, that you will, on examination, find room for more trees. If so, now is a very good time to supply the deficiency; not so good, perhaps, as the spring would have been, but too good to be allowed to pass without improvement. Trees may be transplanted at any time after the growth of the season is over, with perfect safety, and they may be removed at any time, if the fine roots are undisturbed, and during removal retain their hold on the earth. When trees are transplanted in the fall, it is necessary to guard against two dangers to which spring planted ones are not so much exposed. The first of these is, they are apt to become loose in the ground from the action of the winds, as the roots do not take hold of the soil as quickly in the fall as in the spring; and the second is, water is apt to settle in the holes dug, and expose the roots to the injurious action of stagnant water. To prevent the first, if the tree is small, a stake well set in the ground, to which the tree, wound with bass matting, cloth, or something to prevent rubbing, may be securely fastened. If large, and the roots spreading, three sticks placed in a triangular form around the stem, and well fastened down at each angle by wooden hooks driven into the ground, will usually keep the tree in its place. If the soil is tenacious, and there is danger of the holes, when the tree is put in them, becoming pits of stagnant water, drains must be made to them which will prevent the evil at once. Where a number of trees are to be set on such a soil, it will be much benefited by a thorough deep plowing, which will render the soil generally more pervious to water, and prevent its ready accumulation. PRESERVING BUTTER.

Mr. G. Fox, of Hartford, Conn., in a letter to Mr. Ellsworth, published in his last report, says —"There are many things required to insure good butter. The butter itself must be well made; that is, worked enough, and not too much, and salted with rock salt. This being well done, and the buttermilk all expelled, the butter may be packed in good white oak, well seasoned casks, well filled. In cool climates larger casks can be used. In hot climates it is best to have small casks—say from twenty-five to thirty pounds; so that too much need not be exposed while using. Then put these small casks into a hogshead, and fill up the same with strong pickle that will bear an egg, and the butter may be shipped to the West Indies or Europe, and keep perfectly sweet. I have never found saltpetre or sugar of any benefit. Butter of my packing has opened as good in the West Indies as it was in Connecticut. I will remark, that to keep butter in ice houses, when it remains frozen, will answer if the butter is to be continued in the same temperature; but if it is exposed to warm weather after being taken from the ice-house, it will not keep as long as if it had not been exposed to so cold a temperature."

Three Hundred Spinning Wheels in operation on Boston Common.—In an Address delivered before the Caledonia (Vt.) Agricultural Society, by Henry Stevens, Esq., in which the importance of affording suitable encouragement to domestic manufactures is very forcibly set forth, the author says: "We find in the American Annals, an account of the anniversary of a society for encouraging industry, held 1753, on which occasion Boston Common presented a novel sight. In the afternoon, about 300 young female spinsters, decently dressed, appearing on the Common at their spinning wheels, were placed regularly in three rows, and a female was seated at each wheel; the weavers also appeared cleanly dressed, in garments of their own weaving. One of them working a loom on a stage, was carried on men's shoulders attended with music; an immense number of spectators were present at this interesteng spectacle. The Rev. Dr. Cooper preached a discourse, and a collection was made for the benefit of the institution. Ladies of Boston whirling three hundred spinning wheels! These were afterwards the matrons who refused British tea, and who never saw a piano. Wonder if a thousand delicate ladies could not be seen in the city, at their pianos, where one old-fashioned rosy damsel could be found at the healthy exercise of the spinning wheel?"

Mr. Stevens adds—"The woman who manufactures for her own household, and one piece of goods to sell, does more to retain the solid coin in our State, than all the banks or the greatest financiers."

The mummy of a monkey has been found in a good state of preservation under a pile of guano in the island of Ichaboe.

Morse's Telegraph.—This wonderful invention continues to operate daily with perfect accuracy and facility, and with a rapidity which it is difficult to realize. In a few moments after the arrival of the mails from the East at Baltimore, or from the South at Washington, the election returns are transmitted from one city to the other with the fleetness of thought. The intervening space of some forty miles is thus literally annihilated, and Baltimore and Washington are vitually merged into each other. On frequent occasions recently, the election returns were transmitted from Baltimore to Washington and from Washington to Baltimore at the same moment of time—for while each Assistant was communicating to the other, the simple and ingenious apparatus at each station was also recording the information transmitted from the other. Communications, it will be recollected, can be made at any hour of the day or night, and it is not requisite, when the intelligence is transmitted from either station, that any person should be in attendance at the other—inasmuch as the communications, be they long or short, are recorded by the apparatus on paper, and are thus preserved for any length of time.

Lyell's Lectures in England.—In a lecture on the Geology of the United States recently delivered in England by the celebrated Mr. Lyell, he stated that the Ohio coal field extends for a length of seven hundred miles, and that that of Illinois is larger than the whole of England. The coal is formed in workable beds of considerable thickness; and in one instance there is a bed of coal fifty feet thick—which comes up to the surface and is quarried like stone. Another branch of Mr. Lyell's lecture was the consideration of the recession of the Falls of Niagara. He exhibited a large pictorial scene representing the bed of the Nigara River. The ravine formed by the gradual wearing away of the rocks by the waters of the Falls extends for seven miles, and there is no doubt that at one period the Niagara fell over the cliffs at Queenstown three hundred feet high. The present height of the falls is 170 and the rate of recession is about one foot in a year.

Sagacity of a Horse.—One day, lately, the servant man of Mr. Rosser, farmer, near Risca, took an old horse out of the shafts of the cart, and while bustling about, did not perceive that it had walked away. Observing a horse shoe on the ground, which appeared to have just been cast, he conjectured whither the missing animal had gone, and thereupon betook himself to the shop of the smith, where he found Vulcan driving the nail into the sagacious animal's shoe. On inquiry, it was ascertained that the horse had proceeded directly towards the smith's shop, the moment it was loosened from the cart, and the smith, observing that the shoe was gone, had guessed the object of his visit, and performed the work as described. We, perhaps, shall next hear that Dobbin has called at the corn-chandler's and ordered home a bushel of corn.

[Spring's Life in London.

Important Discovery.—The attention of the iron masters has been attracted to a process of considerable importance lately introduced into their manufacture. The application of electricity, to supercede several of the expensive processes, has, it is stated, been tried in the Welsh and Derbyshire furnaces, with satisfactory results. It appears that the costly fuel and labor required for the purification of the ore from sulphur, and phosphorus, and subtle elements, create its high market value, and these being all electro-negative, have induced the new process, whereby the impure stream of metal, after flowing from the blast, is in its moment of consolidation, subject to a powerful voltaic battery, which so disengages the impure components that in the process of puddling, they are readily extracted. The London blacksmiths, it is stated, have tested this iron after a single re-beating, and pronounce it the best metal in the market. By the same process an experiment was tried by Dr. Ure, by whom a soft rod of iron was held in contact with a moderate red heat, and that gentleman is understood to have stated that in a few hours the metal was converted into steel. Should these facts prove what they seem, they are calculated to affect most seriously this important branch of our trade. [Newcastle Advertiser.

Her Majesty's Aviary at Windsor; Interesting Fact to Naturalists.—The following singular and rare (if not unique) occurrence has just taken place at the Royal aviary in the Home Park, at Windsor. It having been deemed advisable by Mr. Walters, the superintendent of her Majesty's aviary, in order to improve the breed of the genuine Dorking fowl, that it should be crossed with that of the Cochin China fowl, the necessary arrangements were made for that purpose. A Dorking hen, which had roosted for some time past with the fowls from China, has recently been in the habit of laying twice, and sometimes thrice a week, eggs containing double or two distinct yolks. Mr. Walters, determining to try the experiment of attempting to hatch one of these double yolked eggs, placed it, with several other eggs, under the hen. The result was, that two chickens were produced from this single egg; one is a cock bird of the pure Cochin China breed, and the other is a hen chick of the Dorking species, both of which are now five days old and in good health. This is a circumstance, as we are informed, unprecedented in the annals of natural history.

Debts of Honor.—Here is an old anecdote worth the room it occupies:—Charles James Fox, in his frolicsome days, was called upon for payment by a tradesman, who held his bill for two hundred pounds. Charles said he could not then pay him. "How so?" said the creditor; "you have lying before you bank notes to a large amount." "These," said Mr. Fox, "are to pay debts of honor." The tradesman threw the bill into the fire. "Now, sir," said he, "mine is a debt of honor, which I cannot oblige you to pay." Charles immediately paid the man.

Another use for India Rubber.—An English paper says that Caoutchouc is an excellent remedy for the tooh-ache. After the cavity of the tooth is cleansed, a piece of Caoutchouc is put on a wire, and being softened in the flame of a candle, is pressed while warm in the tooth. Thus the air is kept from the nerve, and the cause of tooth-ache removed.

Silk.—The quantity of silk raised in this country appears to be steadily increasing. Tennessee has lately given more attention to it than any other state. The quantity raised in 1840 was 1132 pounds, in 1843, the quantity was over 20,000. The practice of feeding worms in open sheds is found to be far preferable to the close rooms, and is now generally adopted.

SIN.

Who laughs at sin, laughs at his Maker's frowns,
Laughs at the sword of vengeance o'er his head;
Laughs at the great Redeemer's tears and wounds,
Who, but for sin, had never wept or bled.

Who laughs at sin, laughs at the numerous woes
Which have this wicked world so oft befell;
Laughs at the whole creation's groans and throes,
At all the spoils of death, and pains of hell.

Who laughs at sin, laughs at his own disease;
Welcomes approaching torture with his smiles,
Dares at his soul's expense his fancy please,
Affronts his God—himself of bliss beguiles.

Who laughs at sin, sports with his guilt and shame,
Laughs at the errors of his senseless mind;
For so absurd a fool there wants a name
Expressive of a folly so refin'd.

Jos. Stennet.

HOME AFFAIRS.

Whatever may be said or imagined to the contrary by the lovers of romance, it is a matter of fact business after all to live in this world. The loves, and the musings, and the day dreams of youth may glitter for a while in the sunbeams of excited expectation; but these shadows soon flee away and give place to substance. The poetry of life may last awhile, but then comes the sober prose, and the heavy, slow moving blank verse which go to make up some of the dark passages in human history. Not a little of modern education is mere poetry. This is a defect which is sometimes keenly felt when fortune frowns, and the sober realities of life press on the attention duties which must be done, but which for want of knowledge, are difficult of performance. The following remarks of Miss Beecher, are worthy of attentive consideration by many of our fair countrywomen.—N. Y. Evangelist.

In past ages, and in aristocratic countries, leisure and indolence and frivolous pursuits have been deemed lady-like, and the refined countenanced such an opinion. But whenever ladies of refinement, as a general custom, patronize domestic pursuits, then these employments will be deemed lady-like. It may be urged, however, that it is impossible for a woman who cooks, washes or sweeps, to appear in the dress, or acquire the habits and manners of a lady; that the drudgery of a kitchen is dirty work, and that no one can appear delicate and refined while engaged in it.

Now all this depends on circumstances. If a woman has a house destitute of neat and convenient facilities, if she has no habits of order and system, if she is remiss and careless in person and dress, then all this may be true. But if a woman will make some sacrifices of costly ornaments in her parlor, in order to make her kitchen neat and tasteful, if she will sacrifice expensive dishes in order to secure such conveniences for labor as protect from exposure, if she will take pains to have the dresses in which she works made of suitable materials and in good taste, if she will rise early and systematize and oversee the work of her family, so as to have it done thoroughly, neatly, and in the early part of the day, she will find no necessity for any such apprehension.

It is because such work has generally been done by vulgar people, and in a vulgar way, that we have such associations; and when ladies manage things as ladies should, then such associations will be removed. There are pursuits deemed very refined and genteel which involve quite as much exposure as kitchen employments. For example, to draw a large landscape, in colored crayons, would be deemed very lady-like, but the writer can testify, from sad experience, that no cooking, washing, sweeping, or any other domestic duty, ever left such deplorable traces on hands, face and dress, as this same lady-like pursuit. Such things depend entirely on custom and associations, and every American woman who values the institutions of her country, and wishes to lend her influence in extending and perpetuating such blessings, may feel that she is doing this whenever, by her example and influence, she destroys the aristocratic associations which would render domestic labor degrading.

EARLY TRAINING.

FROM THE LECTURES OF REV. H. O. SHELTON.

At the period of his birth, man is entirely uneducated. He has a physical, intellectual, and moral nature, all requiring education. It is well known that one part of man may be trained to the neglect of others, which must remain comparatively feeble. Men are just what education makes them: there is little valuable without self-education. To acquire mental power one must think, discipline and train the mind. To obtain a desirable moral nature, he must be humble, truthful, just, and benevolent. To obtain physical strength, skill, and endurance, he must be inured to exercise, activity and toil. Let us take a passing glance at the manner in which this active, thinking, immortal being too often is educated.

His wants, at first, are few and simple; but we torment his stomach with indigestible confectionary, and then to quiet his complaints of distress, stupify his brain with poisonous narcotics. At the age of one year, if he survive his unnatural treatment, (for too large a part of the human family are killed in early life, by dosing and drugging.) he has been observing and collecting facts, and is now anxious to make experiments. He first tries his power on locomotion, and learns the law of gravitation. His falls and failures, his bumps and bruises, are all necessary to teach him confidence and ensure success. The little girl observes her mother wash the dishes, cut out a garment or write a letter. She tries her skill at imitation. The first garment she finds is put into the water: it is snatched away: she learns petulance. She gets the scissors and begins to cut paper. Her ears are pierced with an angry tone, "Put up those scissors: you'll stick 'em into you." While at similar experiments she is told, "If you don't behave better, the bears will catch you." If asking for some delicacy, which she has observed on the table before company, she is told, "I have none (for you.)" She is thus taught falsehood and dissimulation. On hitting her head against the table she is soothed with "Did the naughty table hurt my darling. Give me a rod to whip it." The child is taught revenge. In looking round for apparatus she gets a chair, climbs to the desk, finds the inkstand, and with pen or stick marks the first book she finds, perhaps the Bible. That is pulled away with "You good for nothing ——; I have no peace of my life;" and a box on the ear sends her, squalling and bellowing around the house. In vain the nurse or mother scolds—"Hush, I say—shut up now." Presently a knock is heard at the door—with a supplicating whisper, "There, somebody is coming, stop crying now, and I'll give you something pretty." The neighbor enters and the child screams; until a piece of pie, a sweet meat, or the looking-glass and hammer bribes to silence.

The little boy goes among the mechanics. He begins to experiment. The young pear tree is hacked by his hatchet. He receives a flogging. He finds a shingle and knife, begins to make a sled. "Put up that knife: I've just swept up: I won't have you making a litter here." He next tries the fields; gathers his specimens in Botany or Geology, returns in triumph and asks with eager thirst for knowledge, "What is that?" If his mother has been educated at a fashionable boarding school, where, instead of learning to "darn a stocking or make a pudding," she has been taught to finger a few pieces of ivory and to speak the language "a Paris," or dress "a la mode," the intelligent answer probably will be, "It's a weed: It's a stone." Perhaps before he had time to ask his question, he is driven from the house with, "Carry them off! What do you bring those dirty things here for." Repulsed in his efforts in these branches of science, he tries another. He goes to the street, finds a rill murmuring down the declivity. He builds his dam, sails his boat, or erects his wheel; is pleased with his experiments in hydrostatics or navigation, and returns late to his home. He now gets a whipping for going into the water, and wetting his clothes—with perhaps a threat, "If you do so again, sir, I'll skin you alive." He next tries pitching marbles with idle vicious boys, and escapes punishment. Here he learns mischief, idleness and vice.

THE SOURCES OF LICENTIOUSNESS.

BY DR. WM. ALCOTT.

NO. 4—LATE HOURS.

If the night air were as pure as that of the day, both in and out of doors; if the employments of late hours were of a good tendency; if the temperature were such as it ought to be; and if all other things which strike the mind of a not very careful observer were as they should be, still there is something which, in the best circumstances, renders the habit of sitting up late at night, unfriendly to the cause of virtue.

Am I asked to state more definitely, what that something is? I will make the attempt.

Man, always weak enough, morally, is weakest when he has the least nervous energy. But other things being equal, he has least of this energy at evening. And the later the hour, the greater his weakness; I mean until he has slept.

Let not activity, I mean nervous activity, be confounded with nervous strength or energy; for they are very different things. A person may be more vivacious, or more witty, and yet have less nervous strength. The pulse is quicker at evening than in the morning; and yet it is weaker. So of the intellectual pulsations, thus to speak; and so of the intellectual powers.

Man is weaker, about every way, at evening, than he is in the morning. "Tir'd nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep," comes in at just the right time; and seldom too soon. If he came six hours later—nay, three, or two,—we should suffer. Nine o'clock comes just when it ought; and so does midnight.

He who obeys all the laws of his Creator—moral and natural, may preserve a good measure of his strength till eight or nine o'clock, in the evening; but even before this time his pulse and breathing will become quicker, and if not overpowered by fatigue, the brain will become more active and sprightly. The moral man will also be enfeebled; somewhat in proportion to the feebleness of the physical and moral powers.

The point at which I am laboring is the following. When moral strength is needed, in largest measure, at least, if we are awake,—then—precisely then—it is that the whole man is weakened, unless he sleeps. And this he will do, in truth, if he follows nature and not fashion—if he makes the middle of the night his midnight. The individual who gets half his sleep before midnight—i. e. half the value of it; for one hour before midnight is worth two after—is not very likely to fall under the condemnation of the apostle in I. Thess. v. 7. Instead of giving himself up, with weakened brain and general system, and with moral powers enfeebled in a corresponding degree, to the dominion of the senses; instead of being off his balance, he is himself; or at least much more so than those who keep late hours. They are, in a sense, more or less insane, every one of them; and more or less likely to fall into sin against themselves or somebody else.

Now, then, if I have not utterly failed of accomplishing my purpose, it must be obvious that whatever may become of individual cares, the cause of virtue cannot but be injured more or less, by night hours. We never, at best, hold the moral helm too steady; but strangely infatuated is he, at least strangely ignorant—perhaps both—who, feeling his own weakness and danger of being led into temptation, will yet continue to keep late hours.

Yet many such persons there are among us. Some of them will even pray twice or more daily, "Lead us not into temptation." Will such prayer be answered, when the individual who utters it, by habitual late hours throws himself, as it were, between the very teeth of Him who goeth about ready to devour?

I do not forget that it is open and not secret licentiousness at which in these essays I have resolved to aim. But the vices like the virtues are closely connected, and secret vice and social, if not boon companions, often tread closely upon the heels of each other.

Let not the hasty inference be made that all who sit up late are therefore vicious. There are exceptions to all general rules, and therefore some to any which I may lay down; and the very individual to whom you are ready to say, Thou art the man, may be one of them

But remember, I have not laid it down as a general rule, that those who sit up late will necessarily fall into vice, open or covert, solitary or social. I have only said that by late sitting up, they are necessarily the more exposed to temptation, while they have the less moral power to resist it. And this I say still. The law of physiology is against it; the moral law of God which is higher may not be so, any farther than they are at fault in exposing themselves to trial, with powers which were known to be less competent than usual to resistance.

It is sometimes objected to views like the foregoing; but is it not true that this is a world of trial; and that if all trial and temptation were removed, there could be no moral character formed. To present this objection and to give it weight, is to take for granted that all the temptations in the world are needed; whereas, is it not highly probable that if we avoid as many as we can, and make a wise use of those which remain, there will still be enough left for our trial?

Besides, it should be remembered that, in the present instance, there are other reasons, not yet fully presented, why late hours are inadmissible. They are as unfriendly to health as to virtue and piety. The experiment has been made, in several instances, of simply turning night into day, without connecting with it any other abuses, and always with the same results, viz. with injury to the health. So that here we have an additional reason for avoiding late hours and substituting early ones.

All which has been said, thus far, has been upon the supposition that all the circumstances attendant upon the late hours were of the most favorable kind. In my next number I shall show something of the tendency where it is otherwise.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. Kenyon, as Principal, and Miss Caroline B. Maxson, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

Tuition, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

LEAVES FROM A TRAVELER'S NOTE-BOOK—NO. 8.

WALKS IN LONDON.

Probably no city in the world is so replete with historical associations interesting to an American as London. It has been the birth-place, the place of toil, and the burial-place of large numbers with whose deeds and words his earliest life was familiar. Hence, in his walks, there is scarcely a street he threads, or an old tower he sees, but what can stir his feelings, and carry him back to former times. Even though he were to spend months in searching out its antiquities and curi- [illegible] gratifying. He may have read descriptions of these things, but such descriptions have only served to increase his interest, and add to his gratification in beholding the reality. Should his first walk in London be for business purposes, yet he could not, in such circumstances, pass a church in which some favorite author had preached, or come across a fragment of the old Roman wall, or catch a glimpse of the White Tower, without pausing involuntarily, to think of its history, and compare its present appearance with the thing his imagination had formed. To give an exact picture of these things would of course be impossible; but an account of the impressions they made, written while that impression was yet fresh, may not be destitute of interest.

THE TOWER OF LONDON.

The mass of antique building known as the Tower of London, is situated in the eastern part of the city, on the river Thames, and covers a surface of twelve acres. It is surrounded by a strongly fortified wall, outside of which was originally a deep ditch, which is now being made into a garden. Antiquaries once differed as to the origin of the Tower—some supposing it to have been erected by Julius Cæsar; but the majority now attribute it to William the Conqueror. It was at first used as a palace, but afterwards as a prison and fortress. It was probably with reference to its use in the latter character, that an early writer, in the twelfth century, said, "The mortar was tempered with the blood of beasts." The building is chiefly known as a prison, and its very name, therefore, calls up recollections of fearful and melancholy interest. The White Tower is a lofty square building, with four turrets, and is conspicuous to those who pass along the Thames, as well as to all the surrounding neighborhood. The entrance to it is through four successive gates, which are opened at daylight, with great formality, and with as much precaution as if a hostile army lay in the vicinity ready to attack it. Passing these, the visitor's attention is directed, on the one hand, to the tower in which Queen Elizabeth was imprisoned before her accession, and on the other, to the gate through which State prisoners were brought into the Tower by water. Within sight is the tower in which the two infant princes were smothered by command of their uncle; and near it is the church where Anne Boleyn, Lady Jane Grey, and many other distinguished persons, were buried. As one walks for the first time amid these scenes, it is in silence and heaviness.

In making the circuit of the Tower, the visitor is accompanied by a warder, of whom there are forty connected with the establishment. He is first conducted to the Horse Armory, an apartment 150 feet in length, along the aisles of which are ranged equestrian figures, representing kings and princes from a very early period, each clad in the armor of his time. Here is the suit which actually belonged to Henry VIII.; and there is Henry Hastings, Earl of Huntingdon in 1555, with a suit of plate armor richly gilt, weighing upwards of a hundred pounds—the helmet alone weighing fourteen pounds. In the series may be seen the proud warrior, armed and equipped for the deadly contest; and the gallant knight, with his "tilting-appareil," all ready for the tournament. The figures are arranged in chronological order; each is mounted in the full field costume of its respective era; and over each is an arch, in the left column of which is fixed a banner, giving in letters of gold, the name, rank, and period of the personage beneath. Fronting the horsemen are pages and footmen, dressed in the suit of their time; and behind the horsemen are specimens of ordnance of various periods. The ceiling is completely decorated with arms and accoutrements tastefully and fancifully arranged; while against the walls are placed a variety of halberds, shields, and cuirasses, exhibiting the arms, offensive and defensive, of a long series of years. One feels, while standing among these figures, as if he was actually surrounded by the men and customs of other times. For some reason, the impression which he receives is so vivid and lasting, that ever afterwards he needs only to turn his thoughts toward that place to be again surrounded with steel-clad warriors and tilting cavaliers.

From the Horse Armory, we pass by a staircase through the wall of the White Tower, (which is here 14 feet thick,) into what is called Queen Elizabeth's Armory. This apartment is appropriated to the exhibition of weapons of various kinds and dates. Here is "the Morning-Star, or Holy-Water Sprinkle," a weapon consisting of a ball of wood armed with spikes, and fixed to the end of a long pole by a chain; the term "holy-water" being used as a cant phrase for human blood. Here are also various instruments of torture and death, such as the "Thumbscrew;" the "Iron Collar of Torment;" the "Cravat, or Scavenger's Daughter," used for confining at once the head, hands, and feet—thus binding the body and limbs up into an almost incredibly small compass; the "Heading-block," on which Lords Balmerino, Kilmarnoch and Lovat were beheaded in 1746; and the "Heading axe," said to have been used at the execution of the Earl of Essex.—But this room derives its greatest interest from the general supposition that it was the prison house of Sir Walter Raleigh; a dark closet adjoining being shown as his sleeping room. On the walls, which are of stone, are still legible memorials of other unfortunate occupants. The following appear to have been cut with a knife, or some scrap of iron:—"He that indureth to the ende shall be savid. M. 10. R. Rudson Kent Ano. 1553." "Be faitful unto the deth and I wil give the a crowne of life. T. Fane, 1554." "T. Culpeper of Darford." Similar inscriptions are to be found in other parts of the Tower.

Having disposed of these things, the visitor is conducted to the Jewel-house, where the Regalia is kept. In the centre of the room stands a sort of pyramid, some four feet high, surmounted by a new crown made for her present Majesty; while beneath it are arranged several other crowns, the golden sceptres, the swords of justice and mercy, royalty's baptismal font, and a variety of plate, dishes, etc. The whole is estimated at nearly fifteen millions of dollars; and as we passed from it to the gate of the Tower, where a swarm of beggars met us, we could but think the interest on that investment were better expended in feeding and educating the suffering poor who could never see it.

THE THAMES TUNNEL.

Within a mile of that monument of ancient chivalry and cruelty just described, is a sublime specimen of modern ingenuity and perseverance. The Thames Tunnel is properly a road, twelve hundred feet in length, beneath the bed of the Thames river, seventy-six feet below high-water mark. It consists of two arched passages, each wide enough for a carriage and a pathway for footmen. It connects Rotherhithe and Wapping, at a point about two miles below the London Bridge, where the construction of a bridge was impracticable on account of the vast number of ships which must daily pass above that place to the docks, and where ferry-boats were rendered comparatively useless by the falling of the tide so as to leave the banks a mass a mud. At present the Tunnel is accessible only to footmen, and that by means of a winding staircase at each end. The expense of opening a carriage road by an inclined plane, from either extremity of the Tunnel, has delayed that work, but it will undoubtedly be accomplished before many years. The Tunnel is kept in the most perfect order, and brilliantly lighted with gas. The two archways are only separated by pillars at various intervals; and between these are little tables for the sale of various fancy articles. Between the two pillars which support an arch in the centre of the Tunnel, and of course under the channel of the river upon which the largest vessels may be sailing, is a printing press, on which visitors may print for themselves an account of this immense work. The Tunnel is open at all hours, and during the day a continual stream of pedestrians pass through it, from each of which the company receives one penny. The undertaking has already cost upwards of two millions of dollars, the reimbursement of which cannot be expected very soon.

The idea of forming a passage under the bed of a river was not a new one when the Tunnel was proposep. The coal-miners had before this made passages under the Tyne and Wear; and at Whitehaven an excavation had been made by those men extending for upwards of a mile under the sea The first attempt to tunnel the Thames, was made by an experienced miner named VESEY, who, after considerable progress, felt himself compelled to abandon the work as impracticable. Notwithstanding this disappointment, the importance of a land conveyance below the London Bridge was so apparent, that in 1823 Sir I. M. BRUNEL proposed a plan of tunneling, which was suggested to him by the teredo, a testaceous worm, covered with a cylindrical shell, which eats its way through the hardest wood. Having succeeded in forming a company to raise the necessary capital he began by preparing a strong shaft 50 feet in diameter, which he sunk into the ground as well-shafts are usually sunk. This shaft was sunk to the depth of 65 feet, and another smaller one inside of it was sunk until, at the depth of 80 feet, the ground suddenly gave way, and sand and water were thrown up with great violence. The shaft and reservoir were completed, however, and the horizontal excavation, or the tunnel itself, was commenced at the depth of 63 feet, 38 feet in breadth, and 22 feet in height.

The mode of excavating was by means of a powerful apparatus termed a shield, consisting of twelve great frames lying close to each other like so many volumes on the shelf of a bookcase, and divided into three stages or stories, thus presenting thirty-six chambers or cells, each for one workman, and open to the rear, but closed in front with moveable boards. The front was placed against the earth to be removed, and the workmen, having removed one board, excavated the earth behind it to the depth directed and placed the board against the new surface exposed. The board was then in advance of the cell and was kept in its place by props; and having thus proceeded with all the boards, each cell was advanced by two screws, one at its head and the other at its foot, which resting against the finished brick-work of the tunnel, impelled it forward into the vacant space. The other set of divisions then advanced. As the miners worked at one end of the cell, so the bricklayers formed at the other the top, sides, and bottom, the superincumbent earth of the top being still held up by the shield till the bricklayers had finished.

By the aid of this ingenious and powerful shield, the workmen were enabled to proceed at the rate of about two feet in twenty-four hours, displacing 100 tons of earth, which was lifted to the surface by a steam engine in the shaft, and using 5500 bricks to each foot.

But there were many obstacles yet to be encountered. On one occasion, some vessels arriving at a late tide were moored just over the Tunnel, and the obstruction thus offered to the water occasioned a great removal of the soil beneath, so that the river found its way through the earth and the shield, filling the Tunnel with water and about 1000 tons of loose soil and rubbish. But no lives were lost; and after pumping out the water, the work again proceeded. On another occasion, when the middle of the river had been reached, and the hopes of all seemed [illegible] to be realized, the water suddenly burst in, drowned several of the laborers, and put an end to the work for seven long years. By none of these things, however, could Mr. Brunel be disheartened. After seven years delay the work was again commenced, and in six years its bold projector was permitted to pass down a shaft on the one side of the river, and thence through the Tunnel to the other side.

The Tunnel was opened for foot passengers in March, 1843, since which time it has been visited by thousands, who look upon it as a monument of the unflinching perseverance of its projector.

THE APPROACH TO JERUSALEM.

From Herschell's "Visit to my Fatherland,"

Next morning we rose early to set out on our journey to Jerusalem. I felt a feverish restlessness and anxiety to reach that city, which had been associated in my mind from childhood with all that is sacred and venerable; and I often said within myself as we rode along: "Is it possible that this very day my feet shall stand within the gates of Jerusalem?"

Our route lay for some time through a fertile plain, which had some appearance of cultivation; there being several fields of millet in it. But the farther we advanced on our journey the more barren and desolate the country became. My mind was alternately occupied with two very different pictures. At one time I thought of the days when all the male population of Israel went up "three times a year" to Jerusalem; "whither the tribes go up, the tribes of the Lord, unto the testimony of Israel, to give thanks unto the name of the Lord." In all probability six of the tribes, whose possessions lay northward to where I was then, traveled by this very road; the party increasing at every stage of their journey; "company by company," until they all "appeared before God in Zion." As I thought of this goodly assembly, all animated by one spirit, and intent on one common object, receiving each new accession of brethren with friendly greetings, and beguiling the way with social converse, the melancholy contrast presented by the present state of the country, forcibly recalled the opposite picture, delineated in the writings of the prophets. Nay, I should not say the picture was recalled; the very reality was itself before me. "The highways" are indeed "desolate," and "lie waste;" instead of being trodden by a joyous company of Israel's sons, a few strangers from distant lands come to behold the judgements of the Lord, and to "say, when they see the plagues of that land—that it is not sown, nor beareth, nor any grass groweth therein;—Wherefore hath the Lord done this in this land? What meaneth the heat of this great anger?"

The marks of the curse are, indeed, upon the land. Sometimes a green spot will be seen at a distance, giving the idea of fertility; but when approached, it is found to bear only the tokens of the original denunciation—thorns and briers.

We rode on hour after hour, amid increasing desolation. The latter part of the way lies over a succession of mountain ridges, where there is no regular road, but the horses clamber up the best way they can, sometimes over smooth slabs of stone, and sometimes through heaps of loose stones. My impatience to see the holy city increased every hour. As we climbed up each ridge, I expected that from its summit I should behold Jerusalem; but I was doomed to many disappointments; as summit after summit only gave to view another range of hills to be surmounted. It forcibly reminded me of the journey to the Heavenly Jerusalem, which is a steep and difficult path, presenting one mountain after another to be overcome; but we know that at last we shall reach the City of God; and should not the certainty of this reconcile us to all the difficulties of the way? While on this tedious journey, I was made fully to understand the words of the Psalmist: "As the mountains are about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people from henceforth even for ever."

At length the long-expected moment arrived; about noon we reached the summit of the hill Scopus, and all at once Jerusalem burst upon my view. The feelings of such a moment cannot be described; they can only be faintly imagined by those who have not experienced them. Every Christian traveler speaks of the feeling as overpowering; what, then, was it to me, at once a Christian and a Jew? The scene of the world's redemption—the metropolis of the country of my fathers—"the City of the Great King!" I could in some faint measure, realize the the feelings of my Lord and Master, when "He beheld the city, and wept over it."

But here, as every where else in the Holy Land, you are indebted to association alone. That which actually meets your view is a comparatively modern eastern city; her bulwarks and her palaces are those of the false prophet. The Lord has abhorred his sanctuary; He has given it to be "trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." How near this may be, who can tell?

We went first to the Damascus gate, but were not admitted; we then went round to the Jaffa gate; and by it we entered the Holy City. My feet stood "within the gates of Jerusalem;" a pilgrim and a stranger I entered the city of my fathers, "Jerusalem, which is in bondage with her children;" yet, through the great mercy of God, a citizen of "the Jerusalem which is above."

THE JEWISH PILGRIM AT JERUSALEM.

Are these the ancient holy hills
  Where angels walked of old?
Is this the land our story fills
  With glory not yet cold?
For I have passed by many a shrine,
  O'er many a land and sea,
But still, oh! promised Palestine,
  My dreams have been of thee.

I see thy mountain ceders green,
  Thy valleys fresh and fair,
With summers bright as they have been
  When Israel's home was there:
Though o'er thee sword and time have pass'd,
  And Cross and Crescent [illegible]
And heavily the chain hath press'd,
  Yet thou art still our own!

Thine are the wandering race that go
  Unbless'd through every land,
Whose blood has stained the polar snow,
  And quench'd the desert sand;
And thine the homeless hearts that turn
  From all earth's shrines to thee,
With their lone faith for ages borne
  In sleepless memory.

For thrones are fallen and nations gone,
  Before the march of time,
And where the ocean rolled alone,
  Are forests in their prime,
Since Gentile ploughshares marr'd the brow
  Of Zion's holy hill—
Where are the Roman eagles now?
  Yet Judah wanders still.

And hath she wandered thus in vain,
  A pilgrim of the past?
No! long deferred her hope hath been,
  But it shall come at last;
For in her wastes a voice I hear,
  As from some prophet's urn,
It bids the nations build not there,
  For Jacob shall return.

Oh! lost and loved Jerusalem!
  Thy pilgrim may not stay,
To see the glad earth's harvest-home,
  In thy redeeming day;
But now resigned in faith and trust,
  I seek a nameless tomb;—
At least beneath thy hallowed dust
  O give the wanderer room! [Atheneum.

INFLUENCE OF THE SABBATH.

We take pleasure in transferring to our columns the following reflections of Dr. Chalmers on the influence of the Sabbath. How deep and thrilling ought to be our interest in an institution which was given in Paradise, blessed from the first, and sanctified by the divine example of observing it. Why not retain the institution as originally given, and thus gather into the recollections of one day all the wonderful displays of God's mercy, in creation, in protection, in redemption! By this means might the origin and completion of the plan of salvation be brought directly and freshly before the mind.

"We never in the whole course of our recollections, met with a Christian friend, who bore upon his character every other evidence of the Spirit's operation, who did not remember the Sabbath day, and keep it holy. We appeal to the memories of all the worthies who are lying in their graves, that, eminent as they were in every other grace and accomplishment of the new creature, the religiousness of their Sabbath day shone with equal lustre, amid the fine assemblage of virtues which adorned them. In every Christian household it will be found, that the discipline of a well-ordered Sabbath is never forgotten among the old lessons of a Christian education; and we appeal to every individual who now hears us, and who carries the remembrance in his bosom of a father's worth and a father's piety, if on the coming round of the seventh day, an air of peculiar sacredness did not spread itself over that mansion where he drew his first breath, and was taught to repeat his infant hymn and lisp his infant prayer.

Rest assured, that the Christian, having the love of God written in his heart, and denying the Sabbath a place in his affections, is an anomaly that is no where to be found. Every Sabbath image with every Sabbath circumstance is dear to him. He loves the quietness of that hallowed morn. He loves the church-bell sound which summons him to the house of prayer. He loves to join the chorus of devotion, and to sit and listen to that voice of persuasion which is lifted in the hearing of an assembled multitude. He loves the retirement of this day from the din of worldly business, and the inroads of worldly men. He loves the leisure it brings along with it, and sweet to his soul are the exercises of that hallowed hour, when there is no eye to witness him but the eye of Heaven, and when in solemn audience with the Father, who seeth him in secret, he can, on the wings of celestial contemplation, leave all the cares, all the vexations, and all the secularities of an alienated world behind him."

CHRIST A REFINER.

"He is like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap; and he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver." Matt. 3: 2, 3.

A few ladies, in Dublin, who often met together to read the word of God, one day occupied their attention with the passage now before the eye of the reader. One of the ladies said, she thought that 'the fuller's soap and refiner of silver,' were only the same image to convey the same view of the sanctifying influence of the Lord. 'No,' said another, 'they are not the same image; there is something remarkable in the expression, 'He shall sit as the refiner and purifier of silver.' On going to town, this lady called on a refiner to know the process of refining silver, which he fully explained to her. 'But do you sit, sir, while you are refining?' 'Yes, madam, I must sit with my eye steadily fixed on the furnace; since, if the silver remain too long, it is sure to be injured.' She at once saw the beauty and comfort of the expression. The Lord sees it needful to put his people into the furnace; but he is seated by the side of it. His eye is steadily fixed on the work of purifying, and his wisdom and his love are both engaged to do all in the best manner for them. As the lady was returning to her friends to tell them what she had heard, as she turned from the shop door, the silversmith called her back, and said he had forgotten one thing, and that was, he only knew the process of refining to be complete, by seeing his own image in the silver. When the Lord sees his own image in his people, the work of purifying is accomplished. It may be added, that the metal continues in a state of agitation until all impurities are thrown off, and then it becomes quite still; a circumstance which heightens the analogy of the case, for how

Sweet to be passive in His hand,
And know no will but His.

TRUST IN THE GOD OF PROVIDENCE.

There is a peculiar glory in certain truths when they are seen [illegible] merely, as when one lone star peers through the broken clouds, but in their mutual relations, when each reflects its luster upon the others. So with the doctrine of trust in God, seen in connection with the doctrine of God's overruling Providence.

I am required to trust in the Lord at all times, and pour out my heart before him—to trust him in the deepest affliction and in the richest prosperity—to trust him for spiritual blessings and for temporal blessings also. All this is good, very good. But how is it brought home to my soul with fresh power as a blessed privilege and a most rational duty when I am told that this God encompasses me on every side, that his hand upholds my being each successive moment, controls every event which can possibly affect my welfare or his glory as related to my life or labors—when I read that "not a sparrow falls to the ground without my Father, and even the very hairs of my head are all numbered." These things add a keen and soul-inspiring interest to the idea of trusting the Lord. Let me realize that the pestilence which walks in darkness moves under his eye—that the miasms which waft the fever and plague are sent forth on his mission—that the lightning is his servant, and the storm his messenger—that the wrath of man he can convert to his praise and all the residue restrain,—let all these considerations become visible facts, and take the place of realities in my actual vision, and then I can lay me down upon the pillow of those promises and breath my soul out in sweetest and most perfect trust, assured that verily God is a Father, and so able to save that I have nothing at all to fear. It is so good that such a God should give me such promises!

[Oberlin Evangelist.

PERIODICAL RELIGION.

There is a religion which is too sincere for hypocrisy, but too transient to be profitable; too superficial to reach the heart—too unproductive to proceed from it. It is slight, but, as far it goes, not false. It has discernment enough to distinguish sin, but not firmness enough to oppose it; compunctions sufficient to soften the heart, but not vigor enough to form it. It laments when it has done wrong, and performs all the functions of repentance for sin, except forsaking it. It has every thing of devotion but the stability, and gives every thing to religion but the heart. This is a religion of times, and events, and circumstances. It is brought into exercise by incidents, and dwindles away with the occasion that called it out. Festivals or fasts, which occur but seldom, are much observed, and it is to be feared because they occur but seldom; while the Sabbath, that great festival which occurs weekly, comes too often to be treated with respect and reverence. The piety of people, whose religion is of this kind, comes out too much in sickness, but is apt to retreat again when recovery approaches. If they die, they are placed by their admirers in the calender of saints; if they recover, they place themselves with the world they had renounced, again to live for it while health continues, and again to suspend their amendment as long as death suspends his blow. [Hannah More.

At a church where there was a call for a minister, two candidates appeared, whose names were Adam and Low. The latter preached an elegant discourse from the text—"Adam, where art thou?" In the afternoon, Adam preached from these words—"Lo, here am I!"

THE LAW AND THE GOSPEL.

It is common, among a large class of religious teachers, to make a wide distinction between the Law and the Gospel, and to represent the one as hostile to and subversive of the other. Believing this distinction and representation to be both unjust and injurious, we propose, in several successive numbers, to give our views of the bearing of one upon the other, and of each upon the salvation of men.

BEARING OF THE LAW UPON THE GOSPEL.

The Law is a rule of life which God has given to guide and govern moral agents in their relation to the Creator and to each other. It grows out of the relations which God has constituted; and it may properly be spoken of, therefore, as at the same time a fruit of those relations and an expositor of them. In these circumstances, there are two offices which the law is designed to discharge, deserving of especial notice.

1. It is designed to present us a picture of the Divine Character. Among men it is common to infer the character of a legislator from the laws which he enacts. The justice of this will be apparent, if we consider the relation of those laws to him. They are an expression of his will in the circumstances to which they refer. And since the will is the seat of personality, when that is known it is just to infer character. This principle is extensively acted upon in all the relations of life. From a narrative of philanthropic labors, for instance, we infer benevolence on the part of him who puts them forth. From the marks of ingenuity in a piece of workmanship, we infer the character of its maker. Indeed, almost the only means we have of judging respecting the character of those around us, is that which is furnished by their doings.—Now, in regard to God this is true in a still higher degree, because his nature and position are such as to prevent our direct intercourse with him. His invisibility and intangibility prevent his being recognized by any of man's natural senses, and make it necessary that some medium of communication should be provided in order to our distinct apprehension of his character and authority. It is true, we may read his power and wisdom in the world which he has created, in the heavens above us, and in the order and harmony which every where pervade his works. But with this knowledge alone the mind is not satisfied. It asks to know something of his higher attributes; and it will not rest until these are to some extent understood. Not until the divine character is appreciated as drawn out in the law, does the soul find peace in believing. Here such a light is thrown upon the present and future as gives confidence and hope to man. Here, from the tendency of all his laws to secure the rights of those placed under them, not less than from the penalty affixed to wrong, we may infer his justice; in the protecting influence thrown around the heart, we may find proof of his purity; and by the cognizance which is taken of the thoughts of the mind, he declares his spirituality. In short, whatever precept we examine, we find in it an exhibition of his character and a symbol of his presence.

2. Another design of the law is, to unfold the relation which man, as subject, sustains to God, as lawgiver. He is dependent, and constantly requires the sustaining hand of another. He stands in such a relation to the source of his help, as to render an acknowledgment of his dependence both just and necessary. In addition to this, the strongest obligations bind him to reverence and serve the author of all good. But he is not left merely to infer this, and therefore to doubt and overlook it. The law of God, by the requisitions which it makes upon him, brings to his mind these relations, and removes all occasion for hesitation and uncertainty. It presents the relations by pointing out the duties to which they give rise; and it is, therefore, an ever-present monitor, speaking of the claims of God, and encouraging man to yield obedience to those claims.

Such are among the designs of the law of God. Now consider their bearing upon the supposition that the Gospel is hostile to and destructive of the law. If it be the design of the law to present a picture of the divine character, and to show man's relations, this supposition implies a change in that character and those relations which is totally inconsistent with the declarations and promises of the Bible. While, therefore, God continues to occupy the throne, and to maintain his authority; while man's relations are such as to demand of him reverence and obedience; while truth and justice continue to be due between man and man, we have reason to expect, that any new arrangement which may be introduced for man's benefit, will be in harmony with, and not subversive of the moral law.

RELIGION IN FRANCE.

The religious condition of France has undergone considerable changes within a year past. Evangelical piety has secured a strong hold upon the hearts of the people, even in many sections where papal authority is acknowledged. Interesting revivals have been witnessed in several places, and the evangelical churches seem much engaged to promote religion. It is cheering to know, likewise, that piety is gaining ground among some of those who are exerting a wide influence. The Duchess of Orleans, widow of Louis Philippe's son who was so suddenly taken away, and mother of the present heir-apparent to the throne of France, is said to be a decidedly pious lady. She belonged to a royal family in the west of Germany, where she enjoyed the instructions of a pious mother, and she is now diligently imbuing the minds of her children with the principles of the Gospel. On this account, in part, efforts have been made to remove the children from under her influence. But to this Louis Philippe, though a papist himself, will give no favor. He has appointed a Romish priest, however, to assist in their education. There are many other persons in high places who give evidence of decided piety. These facts should encourage Christians to hope and pray for France.

OPPOSITION TO THE BIBLE.

Our readers will remember the letter of the Pope, published some months since, in which several Bible Societies were anathematized, and the faithful warned to be on their guard against them. This letter has been followed up by a circular, issued on the 18th of August, under the authority of which copies of the Scriptures and other books are seized and taken from travelers in some parts of the papal dominion. In Sardinia private copies of the Bible have been taken from English gentlemen and their families, thus robbing them of the bread of life for the sake of gratifying this hatred and fear of the word of God. In some cases, where such a course has been demanded, the book has been taken charge of, or put under arrest, conveyed beyond the limits of the country, and then delivered to its proper owner. These facts speak louder than any fine-spun arguments against a religious system which must be supported by such means; they are a practical commentary upon its fruits, and are therefore the things by which we are to judge. Any church, or any religious doctrine, which withdraws from the light or attempts to shut it out, ought to be rejected. This rule should be applied to Protestantism as well as Romanism. Whatever doctrines in either system will not stand the test of a Scriptural investigation, are unworthy of confidence; and the men who advocate such doctrines are really, and ought therefore to be called, opposers of the Bible.

THE REFORMATORY MOVEMENTS OF THE DAY.

The efforts made by a certain portion of the religious community, in the way of Conventions, agencies, lectures, &c., to promote the first day of the week to honor, are made in a total disregard of those who doubt its claims to any honor, above what is due to other days. In such movements it is always ASSUMED, that—with the exception of a small fanatical band who observe "the Jewish Sabbath," and are on that account so closely allied to Jews, that they may be ranked with the accursed of God—there is a universal agreement among Christians, that the first day has been divinely appointed as the Christian Sabbath; and that this universal agreement is a full warrant for these conventional efforts to enforce it as obligatory on men to observe the day in question as a holy day. It is also ASSUMED, that those who are lax, or indifferent, about observing the day, must of course be doing violence to their own consciences, and can have no good claim to be acknowledged Christians.

In view of such assumptions, we distinctly and emphatically assert, that it is NOT TRUE, that there is a universal agreement among Christians in regard to the sanctity of Sunday. We admit that Presbyterians, and those whose system of theology is akin to theirs, are generally agreed in regard to its sanctity, and have no scruple about appealing to the fourth commandment when they undertake to enforce its claims. At this we do not greatly wonder. Those who can make the law of circumcision apply to the ordinance of baptism, will meet with no difficulty in applying the law of the Sabbath to the first day of the week. The sliding rule works very easily in their hands. But Presbyterians are not the only denomination of Christians in all the world. Others may have some claim to be heard. Do Baptists generally believe, that the first day of the week is divinely appointed as the Sabbath? A few of them do. But we have good ground for saying, that a very large proportion of them do not. And though the word Sabbath may be often in their mouths, yet it is more in accommodation to a popular way of speaking, than from any conviction of the proper application of the term. Press the Sunday upon them by quoting the fourth commandment, and they will soon let you know that they have studied a different system of logic. Do Episcopalians regard the day as holy by divine appointment? The great mass of them, both in England and in this country, consider it as standing principally upon tradition, and will much sooner prop it up by quotations from the ecclesiastical fathers, than by the word of God. And how with the Quakers? Every body knows, that they consider the first day of the week no more holy than other days, and would just as soon perform manual labor on that day as any other, were it not for the civil law. As for the Lutherans of this country, we are not so well informed. But we presume, that like those of the old country, they follow in the steps of the great Reformer, who held that the law of the Sabbath was abolished, and that Sunday was only a festival of the church, which had been appointed, and might be altered at her pleasure. Then as for Roman Catholics, they never pretended to keep Sunday, out of regard to any other authority than that of the Church, maintaining from the beginning, that she has power "to change times and laws." But setting aside this denomination, we believe that but a very small part of the Christian world regards Sunday as a divinely appointed season, to be observed according to the requirement of the Sabbath law. And it is our sober conviction, that the looseness which obtains in regard to its observance, is traceable to the opinions of men concerning its claims upon them, quite as much as to that corruption of heart which resists the law of God. Yet the leaders of these reformatory movements hold up the idea to the public, that it is the corruption of the human heart alone, which opposes the barrier to Sunday's honor.

Understand us, then—we deny that Christians universally agree, that the first day of the week is a divinely appointed Sabbath. There is, to be sure, a very general agreement among them in making it a day of public worship; but as to the grounds of making it such, there is a very great dis-agreement. Some do so on the ground of the fourth commandment, supposing it to be the Sabbath. Others consider themselves bound by Apostolical example, and think that the only ground of obligation; yet even these are not agreed how far the example of the Apostles binds them, whether to sanctify the whole day, or only so much of it as may be necessary for public worship. Others think that the authority of the Church is all that requires it. Others again make it their day of worship, merely for the sake of falling in with the majority. But of the whole number, only a few feel their consciences bound by the law of God. But few, comparatively, feel that God says to them concerning the day, "in IT thou shalt not do any work." They know that God once said so concerning the seventh day; but when the attempt is made to slide this injunction over to the first day, their consciences do not subscribe to it.

While there is so much difference of opinion concerning the ground of obligation to observe the Sunday, there is nevertheless a comparative indifference to making it the subject of discussion. Those who are zealous for the keeping of the day on the ground of the fourth commandment, take advantage of this, and construe the backwardness of others to advance their views, as a tacit admission that Sunday is the Sabbath of the Bible. With an air of great assurance, they tell the community that "the day is divinely appointed as the Christian Sabbath, that question having been long since settled in the minds of all pious, sensible men." In this way they work upon our law-makers and administrators of justice, and contrive to get civil penalties inflicted upon those whom they are pleased to denounce as the refractory. In this way they get up their conventions, not for the purpose of giving scope to free discussion, and investigating the ground-work;—oh no, that might lead some people to think Sunday is not so holy after all;—but, for the purpose of getting up an excitement, in order to give the cause such an impulse as "a zeal according to knowledge" never would give it. In this way they persuade the directors of our railroads, canals, and other public accommodations, to stop their conveyances on the first day of the week. And when an honest Sabbatarian on his journey is overtaken by the Sabbath, and "rests according to the commandment," on Sunday morning he finds he must stop still another day, and pay a bill at the tavern which his scanty circumstances are but ill able to meet, because those of a different religious faith say, '[illegible] be governed by our conscience as well as your own.' When he gets home, instead of being able to work six days in the week, as his more favored neighbors do, and thus making up his loss, the manufacturer, merchant, or farmer, gives him employment but five; so that the profit of his labor is one-sixth less than that of others. At home and abroad, therefore, he suffers vexation and loss. Yet this is called equality; and that is called religion, which seeks to perpetuate this state of things! Yes, and when a Doctor of Divinity, before a conclave of kindred spirits, lifts himself upon his toes, points to this vexed and harassed people, and exults that their privileges by law are less than those of their opponents, his zeal is applauded as if he had done God service!

We wish, however, distinctly to say, that if the directors of a railroad, or the owners of a steamboat, choose to cease running their conveyances on the Sunday; if they do it voluntarily, and from a conviction that the law of God requires it; we shall not find fault with them. What we protest against, is, the continual effort to wheedle them into the notion that public opinion demands it. When, or in what instance, has a car, or a stage, or a steamboat, or packet, stopped running on Sunday, because its proprietors thought it wicked to continue it? Such a result, if we are not greatly deceived, has always proceeded from a different cause. It has been brought about by holding up the idea, that the religious public are all agreed—an idea that we have shown to be false—and that a decent respect for them demanded it. If the religious public were all agreed, we would not think it wrong to make it the ground of appeal to the proprietors of our public accommodations. But as they are not, we protest. To persist in holding up the idea that they are, is a "pious fraud."

Our objection, then, is not so much to the end proposed, as to the means by which it is sought to accomplish it. 'Let us not do evil that good may come,' is a maxim that may be safely adhered to "through thick and thin." Trickery, or fraud, resorted to in order to accomplish what seems to be a very desirable object, will in the end produce a reaction, tenfold worse than the evil now deplored. What then will be the consequence, when the proprietors of our traveling conveyances come to discover that they have been deceived?—that the religious public, after all, were not united in opinion about the holiness of the day they wanted sanctified? Will they not again start their conveyances, and in a spirit of retaliation, carry the matter to such extravagance, that even the entire union of Christians in right views, will have no effect upon them? Then we shall see Sabbath-breaking with a witness. Then we shall see infidelity in its maddest forms.

In conclusion, we would say, that the true method of promoting Sabbath sanctification, in our opinion, is to give the people sound instruction in the law of God; to discuss calmly and fearlessly those views wherein people differ concerning the institution; and to exercise the spirit of forbearance towards those who do not choose to keep the Sunday, discriminating with more justice as to their motives, and not sweepingly, and in hot haste, denouncing them as sinners above all others.

SECRET TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES.

Among the friends of temperance in some sections of the country, societies have recently been formed, which it is feared will retard rather than promote the temperance cause. They are much on the plan of mutual assistance associations, and hold many of their meetings in secret. The movement undoubtedly originated in a sincere desire to promote a good cause. But when it is considered how difficult a thing it is to inspire public confidence in secret societies, and how readily suspicions are raised that their deeds may be deeds of darkness, the prospect is not flattering that good will result from them. Whatsoever is true and lovely needs no concealment, but rejoices in the light. Hence Christianity has secured confidence and has greatly flourished in the midst of the deadliest opposition, without any support from such means. We believe that the surest way to diminish confidence and regard for it, would be for its friends to adopt the habit of meeting in secret. So it is with any good cause. If a hold is to be maintained upon public confidence and sympathy, it must by an open and frank announcement of its doctrines and pursuit of its objects.

IMPORTANT DISCUSSION.

Two distinguished Baptist preachers, Rev. Richard Fuller, D. D., of South Carolina, and Rev. Francis Wayland, D. D., President of Brown's University, R. I., have commenced a discussion on the subject of slavery, through the columns of the Christian Reflector. The position and influence of these gentlemen are such as to render them appropriate and interesting disputants. They were led to this discussion, probably, by the course pursued at the Baptist Convention last spring, together with the recent action of the Home Mission Board; and a full exposition of the feelings of northern and southern Baptists may therefore be expected in the course of the discussion. Dr. Fuller's first letter is occupied mainly with a statement of his reasons for denying that slavery is a moral evil. These reasons are drawn from his interpretations of certain Scriptures and his definition of slavery. Dr. Wayland, in reply, acknowledges his agreement with many things in the letter he is answering, speaks of the charge of harsh language from the abolitionists, shows that the fault lies equally against their accusers, presents some things to prove that the question was more candidly discussed in early than in modern times, and so prepares the ground for future combat.

SOUTHERN VIEWS OF SLAVERY.

It is gratifying to observe the change of sentiment and feeling which has taken place within a few years past, respecting the evils of slavery. Only a short time since, the subject was treated among politicians as one of minor importance, the discussion of which ought not to trouble either the North or the South; but now it is acknowledged to be a subject of vast importance, and is warmly discussed in connection with nearly every political measure. In the church too, at the same time, the evil was spoken of as altogether a political one, with which religious men, as such, had nothing to do; but now ecclesiastical bodies, even in slaveholding states, do not hesitate to denounce it as a moral evil which calls for immediate removal. Without any reference to the means by which this change has been produced, we see not how it can be regarded with other feelings than those of deep satisfaction and joy. It is one of the most encouraging signs of the times, and gives a pledge that the evil under the weight of which we have long groaned shall yet be removed. We rejoice in the change, therefore.

The following extract is from a letter of the West Tennessee Presbytery in reply to a general letter addressed to many southern districts. It corroborates what has just been said.

"We agree with you, that the ministry and the church of Christ are deeply involved in the responsibility of the existence of slavery, and of its continuance, and of every degree of rigor with which the yoke of oppression is bound upon the neck of a suffering man, and trust we are, as individuals, willing to do whatever manifest duty dictates. As individuals, we are not called master by any human being.

"The conviction has long been exclusively prevalent among us, that we must dispose of the evil, or it will dispose of us; and beyond the spray of popular excitement, there is a sober second thought from which something may be hoped on the subject. Throughout the eastern division of Tennessee, a small part of which we occupy, we find but few slaveholders who dare to justify the system, but barely venture to palliate, in their particular cases. In our Presbytery, there is not one, and in the churches under our care, there are but few, who consider the system of slavery, as it exists among us, in any other light than a sin against God and man, and detrimental to all the better interests of the community."

"The Synod of Kentucky, at its late session, pledged their co-operation in carrying out, as they say, 'any judicious plan for extending the Gospel to this long-neglected class of our population,' and recommend all ministers to hold special stated meetings for the benefit of negroes, and all masters to use diligent efforts for their moral and religious improvement."

A TEMPERANCE LECTURER.—J. B. Gough, the devoted and eloquent temperance lecturer, reports that since May 1843, he has traveled 11,916 miles, delivered 563 regular lectures, spoken in 168 different towns, and obtained 26,930 names to the pledge.

UNJUSTIFIABLE DISTINCTION.—Considerable excitement was recently created among the Jews of Charleston, S. C., in consequence of the Governor of the State having in his proclamation recommended a day of public humiliation and prayer only to those who believed in the Father and his Son, the Saviour. A meeting was held at which one hundred Israelites remonstrated against this distinction being made by the Governor, since no such distinction is recognized by the Constitution and laws. In reply, the Governor says he is the Chief Magistrate of a Christian community, and that he has no apology to offer. It is quite possible the community may be Christian, but if a possession of the spirit of Christ is necessary to a Christian, we think the Governor gives poor evidence of being one himself.

SAINTS' DAYS.—Rev. Sidney Smith has hit upon a capital way of taking off certain saint-worshipers who have adopted the custom of dating their letters from some feast, or fast, or other church holiday, as from the "Feast of the Visitation," "Feast of the Transfiguration," &c. His mode is, in replying to letters dated after this fashion, to begin in some such way as this, "Baking-day," "Eve of Washing-day," and the like. This is treating foolishness according to its folly.

BOOKS FOR THE BLIND.—The American Bible Society, at a heavy expense, said to be about $10,000, has published the Holy Scriptures in raised letters for the use of the blind, thus removing one great obstacle to the improvement of that class of unfortunates. Rev. Joseph Thayer has recently commenced an effort to supply the blind with the Book of Common Prayer, and is appealing to the members of the Episcopal Church for assistance to complete the work. He says a very considerable portion of the blind are Episcopalians, and that the fixedness of its character renders the Prayer Book peculiarly adapted to their wants.

CATHOLIC MISSIONS.—From the report of a Catholic Society in Lyons, France, called the Association for the Propagation of the Faith, it seems that over $150,000, and one hundred missionaries, have been sent to this country within the past year. The reason for making this a field of especial effort at the present time, is thus given in the Report. "The Holy See could not observe the commencement of a great nation, without feeling an interest in its religious destiny."

A JEW'S OPINION OF HIS OWN RELIGION.—Here is a specimen of the eloquence which comes from the heart. It is taken from a sermon by a Jewish Rabbi, preached in Paris on the second day of Pentecost, (May 25.)

"My brethren, a religion based on cold conviction or dry demonstration is none at all. It is but a barren religion without warmth or soul; a frozen, dead religion, without noble energy or sublime devotedness. I will have none of it! . . . . O how the heart of man should be filled with love for Him who says, 'Come to me, whoever thou art, rich or poor, great or mean, happy or wretched, come to me, and find a heart which knows thee and loves thee; for I am with thee, I am thy Father, both when I chastise and bless in life and after death!' O what a balm of consolation for a distracted heart! how this religion assuages evils and binds up wounds; and how sweet to say, 'My beloved is mine and I am his!' And this religion is our own."

REV. ABEL BROWN, who has been for some time past the editor of an anti-slavery paper in Albany, and the General Agent of the Eastern New-York Anti-slavery Society, died at Canandaigua on the 8th instant. The disease which led to his sudden death was a brain fever, brought on, it is said, by his unremitting and indefatigable labors.

DR. GOING.

In our last we barely announced the death of Rev. Dr. Going, formerly known as Secretary of the American Baptist Home Missionary Society, and editor of the American Baptist. He died on the morning of the 9th inst., after having languished for several months. In his death, as in his life, he enjoyed an unshaken confidence in the Saviour, for whose cause he had expressed the deepest interest during his protracted illness. The following notice of his life we copy from the Christian Watchman:—

Dr. Going received his first degree in the arts, in 1809, at Brown University, of which institution he was a regular graduate. The honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him in 1832, by Waterville College. For several years, in the earlier part of his ministry he was the pastor of the Baptist Church in Cavendish, Vt., where his labors were unwearied, and not without success. Many now living, remember with gratitude his plain, faithful preaching, and speak of him with tender affection as their spiritual father. Soon after the organization of the First Baptist Church in Worcester, Mass., he became its pastor, and with great fidelity devoted to its interests his utmost strength. His labors in that town and throughout the country, contributed much to the prosperity of the churches. To his exertions for the benefit of the feebler churches, may be traced the origin of the Baptist Convention of Massachusetts.

In the year 1831, Dr. G. made a tour to the West, and became deeply convinced of the importance of increased efforts for the spiritual culture of that section of the Union. After his return, he conferred extensively with his brethren in the Atlantic States, and the result was the formation of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, of which he was appointed the Corresponding Secretary. Taking leave of his people at Worcester, he removed to New York, and entered upon the duties of his office with an energy of purpose, and a fervor of devotedness that have seldom been surpassed. In this department he labored entirely beyond his strength, and he was at length compelled, by alarming symptoms of disease, to transfer the work that he loved, to other hands. From that period till his death, he was the President of Granville College.

SABBATH ACCIDENTS.

One Side.—A Philadelphia correspondent of the New York Evangelist, under date of Monday, Nov. 18, writes as follows:—

"Yesterday a serious accident occurred. Two men were riding, and the horse took fright and dashed the carriage against a post. One is thought to be fatally injured.

"I will hear make a suggestion. I may be wrong in my views, but I think not. The suggestion is this: that many more persons are seriously and fatally injured on the Sabbath in proportion to the number who are exposed to injuries, than any other day of the week. Is this true, or is it not? Call to mind the casualties which have occurred within your own knowledge, and decide. If it is true, do we not see in it God's marked displeasure against those who dare to desecrate that day which he has required us to keep holy."

The Other Side.—We are sorry to have occasion to record the following shocking accidents which happened on Sabbath last:

1. "About 11 o'clock on Saturday morning, Nov. 23, an accident happened on the Reading railroad which resulted in the immediate death of one human being and the injury of another, so that he is not expected to survive. As a Mr. McClintock and his nephew, J. P. Service, were driving in a wagon out of a lane leading from their premises to the railroad, near the Falls of Schuylkill, the wagon was struck by a coal train, dashed to pieces, and the two men were thrown upon the track. [illegible] over by the car with which they first came in contact, his spine was crushed, and he was picked up a mangled corpse. Mr. McClintock had his arm broken in two places, several ribs fractured, and was otherwise so badly injured that it is thought he cannot recover."

2. "On Saturday, Nov. 23, at East New York, a young lady, 15 years of age, Miss Almira Smith, eldest daughter of Mr. Ezekiel Smith, of the village of New Lots, had both of her legs crushed and cut off in the act of jumping from the Long Island railroad cars on their passage east. The cars had passed about sixty yards beyond the usual stopping place, when she was in the act of getting out, and supposing they were not going to stop, she jumped; her basket caught some part of the car, which dragged her under the wheels."

3. Cornelius Wildman, Esq., one of the editors of the New Haven Palladium, met with a severe accident on Saturday afternoon. He was returning from a visit to a sick brother in Guilford. The horse took fright, ran, and fell and killed himself. Mr. and Mrs. W. were both thrown from the carriage and injured—Mrs. W. very severely in her arms and side.

We will here make a suggestion. It is this: that just about as many persons are fatally injured on the true Sabbath in proportion to the number who are exposed to injuries as on any other day of the week; and that no more persons are injured on Sunday in proportion to the number who are exposed to injury, than on any other day of the week. Sunday is a holiday, in which thousands are set free from labor, who run into every kind of excess, as the advocates of Sunday frequently assert. Of course accidents might be expected upon such a day.

"Butler Asylum for the Insane."—The Legislature of Rhode Island, in January last, passed an act incorporating an Asylum for the Insane, which is to be called by the above name, to commemorate the munificence of Cyrus Butler, Esq., who gave forty thousand dollars towards establishing and endowing it. The sum of $120,000, which was necessary for its completion, has been secured. A site for the institution has been purchased in the vicinity of Providence, about two miles from the centre of the city, on the bank of the Seekonk river. This will be another monument to the humanity and liberality of that State already distinguished for its patronage of learning.

A Preacher's Life.—An English Wesleyan preacher, in giving an account of his labors from the year 1780 to 1822, concludes it as follows:—I have enjoyed in my ministry 2,028 Sabbaths; read the Scriptures, two chapters for each day, 36,500 times; preached 8,112 sermons; occupied 15 pulpits; ridden 117,700 miles; and my salary never at any time amounted to £50 per annum."

We learn that two gentlemen have purchased of Mr. Morse the right to construct a magnetic telegraph from New York to Boston. It is to pass through Westchester county, Hartford, New-Haven, Springfield, and Worcester, to the capitol of Massachusetts. Prof. Morse also intends, in company with another gentleman, to construct a line from Albany to Buffalo next season.

The official returns of the late election in the State of New York, give the following total results: For Polk 237,588, for Clay 232,408, for Birney 15,812.

The Jews in Russia.—A decree published by the Russian Council of State, with the sanction of the Emperor, prescribes that henceforth no Jews' Synagogue or school shall be erected within 600 feet of any Russian-Greek Church. At the same time, the government at Warsaw has added to the form of the oath to be taken by Israelite recruits, on their joining the army, the following strong clause:—"I swear to be faithful to my standard, and never desert it, even should the Messiah come upon earth."

The Bible in Europe.—At a recent Bible Anniversary in Worcester, (England,) it was stated by Lieut. Wilson that 145,000 copies had been distributed in France, during the last year, amid increasing opposition from Roman Catholics. In Belgium, he said, the call for the Scriptures had been unprecedented; and the decree issued from Rome against their being read had only excited the curiosity and anxiety of the people to procure the book. In Holland great quantities were being disposed of, and in the Carpathian mountains the Society had given away great numbers, at the urgent request of a clergyman. In Spain they had not been able to do much, owing to the opposition, but a few friends had circulated a considerable number, privately, the last year.

General Intelligence.

SEVENTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

By the arrival of the Britannia at Boston on the 22d, we have European news to the 5th inst. There is nothing of very great interest.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert were about visiting the Marquis of Exeter, and it is said they have promised to visit the King of France in Paris next year.

Louis Philippe's return to France has increased the discussion in the French journals respecting the policy of his visit, some approving and others denouncing it.

The Royal Exchange, London, was opened on the 4th inst., with great display.

Repudiators.—We stated some time ago, that a proposition had been made to exclude from the social and other advantages of the London clubs all Americans belonging to the insolvent States. The war of aggression has commenced, but it is much more stringent in its application than we intimated at the time, or had any conception of. It will embrace all Americans, without reference to what part of the Union they come from. The innocent will suffer disgrace equally with the guilty States. An American gentleman of the most unblemished character was refused admission into one of the largest clubs in London on the sole ground that he belonged to a Republic that did not fulfil its engagements. All possible pains were taken to convince the gentleman that there was not the slightest personal objection to his admission, and that his own reputation was such that the club would have had the greatest pleasure in receiving him had he belonged to a more creditable government. In fact, the whole affair, and the manner in which it was done, may be considered as reflecting quite as much honor on the gentleman himself as it conveyed a deep reproach to America. No distinction, we understand, has been made as to the State to which an individual may belong, but the whole United States are looked upon as equally tarnished."

New Town.—Opposite the port of Liverpool, new docks are about being formed, on a scale so extensive, that the area of one of them will be equal to the whole dock accommodation of Liverpool; and a town is rapidly rising there, where a few years ago was a bleak and barren shore, that promises, not remotely, to outride in gigantic grandeur, the source from which it sprung.

Harriet Martineau states, in a letter to a friend, that she has been much benefitted by submitting to the mesmeric process, so much that after a long confinement to her room, she can now take a three-mile walk with ease and pleasure.

The Great Britain is at length released from her protracted confinement at Bristol. It is intended that she shall make one or two trial trips, after which she will proceed to London, and afterwards from Liverpool to America.

It appears from an official return, that at the end of August last, there had been completed in Germany, 475 French leagues of railroads, and that the capital employed amounted to about 50 million pounds sterling.

A fire broke out recently in D[illegible] house of a person belonging to a sect called the White Quakers. The inmates refused to admit of assistance, and made no exertions to extinguish the flames, declaring from the windows that God would protect his own. The police forced an entrance, and put out the flames.

A public subscription has been commenced for the relief of Father Mathew, the apostle of temperance, who, by his liberality in support of the cause, has involved himself in great and ruinous pecuniary difficulties. Lord Cloncurry has contributed £50. It appears from a paragraph in the Cork Examiner, that the Rev. Mr. Mathew has actually been arrested for debt. His debts are said to amount to £5,000. The money now collecting will speedily exceed this sum, and leave the philanthropic friar something on hand.

France.—The Paris papers announce that France is taking steps to abolish negro slavery in its colonies. The Governor of the Island of Bourbon, in opening the Colonial Council on the 20th of May last, made a similar statement. Into that island free laborers from China and the East Indies will be imported.

Violent storms ravage the South of France.—In Marseilles the inundations have been so great that the water rose above the carriage wheels in the streets. A terrific storm visited Toulouse on the 24th October. At Avignon and other towns, the Rhone, the Durance, and the Saone, have overflowed, and committed much injury.

A very destructive storm and whirlwind ravaged Cette, near Montpelier, on the 22d of last month. An inundation followed; the waters of the canal rising to a great height. Boats and lighters were sunk, and thirty persons are supposed to have perished in them. Some merchant vessels were also wrecked in the harbor. The appearance of the town is described as horrible—as if it had sustained a siege.

Algiers—The accounts from this country give the details of a most sanguinary conflict between a party of Cabyles and the French, in which the former lost 600 men, and the latter between 50 and 60, with 150 wounded. The French were commanded by General Comman. The scene of the fight was a mountain fastness where the Arabs fought desperately, and the French, owing to falling short of ammunition, were obliged to retreat into the plain. New disasters commenced in their retreat. Marshal Bugeaud was about proceeding thither with 5,000 men.

From Texas.—The Galveston News of the 2d inst., contains a letter from Corpus Christi, dated October 22d, which confirms the report published some weeks since of the descent of about five hundred Camanche Indians, headed by the noted chief Santa Anna, upon a rancho near Guerrero, called "La Pabrialto," which they completely destroyed, killing over sixty persons.

The Indians were afterward attacked by the troops of Mier and Guerrero, but they defeated the troops, killing about forty, and taking one piece of artillery, which they threw into the Rio Salado. They then continued on into the interior, killing and taking prisoners, until they reached China, 150 miles from the Rio Grande, there destroying the Rancho Ramiras. They were then attacked by 600 troops, who defeated the Indians, and took from them near 200 prisoners whom they had captured. The loss on the side of the Indians is about 30, among whom is said to be their chief, Santa Anna.

The last mails received at Galveston from the interior, contain intelligence of the ratification of the long-talked-of Indian treaty with the Camanches, and ten other of the wild Indian tribes.

The Vindicator, published at Washington, says—"The consummation of this treaty, if kept sacred by both parties, will do more to advance the true interests of the West, than a dozen companies of mounted men."

From Mexico.—Advices have been received from the city of Mexico to the 2d inst.

In New Mexico there have been more Indian disturbances. An attempt was made to assassinate the Governor in his own house. Fortunately it was unsuccessful, and the criminal was himself killed. Various encounters between the Indians near Abiquich and the Mexicans had taken place, in which many men were killed. The Mexicans, as usual, attribute all these collisions to the enmity of the Americans, foolishly supposing that the Indians are supplied with their ammunition, &c. from American trading posts.

Those best informed in Mexican affairs think a revolution inevitable—many that the train is already laid, and that the explosion will be heard immediately.

Extraordinary Land Slip.—A most remarkable land slip happened on Thursday, the 15th inst. near Lebanon, N. H. The following account of it is by a person who was on the premises:—

About three miles to the eastward of the village is a high conical hill rising perpendicularly on its southern side, but on the north sloping gradually from the summit to the rich table-land below. Having occasion to transact business with Mr. Gourlay, one of the tenants of this hill, I was detained until about half-past ten o'clock in the evening, when we were startled by a sudden explosion. Our first impression was, that a piece of artillery had been discharged in the rear of the farm buildings, but after reflecting on the exceeding improbability of such an event, we referred the detonation to an earthquake or some subterranean convulsion. For the next few minutes we sat in a state of considerable alarm, which was a good deal augmented on hearing unusual sounds from the byers and stables, as if the cattle were struggling to get loose. Just as we started from our seats by a sort of instinctive resolve to ascertain the cause of this singular occurrence, we suddenly felt the house in motion.

At first there was a violent jerk, then a movement onwards, not unlike the first starting of a ponderous railway train. Gradually the motion increased, until we found ourselves moving along at a rapidly accelerating rate. It was a clear, starry night, and I could see the boughs of trees in the distance passing the windows, just as we perceive the transit of similar objects from the window of a traveling vehicle. This continued for two or three minutes, and then there was a sudden stop, producing another violent jerk, which threw my friend and me to the opposite end of the room. We ran immediately to the door, and our astonishment may be more easily conceived than described, on discovering ourselves in an entirely new locality. I saw at once that a land-slip had taken place; but although I had read of similar occurrences in the districts around the Alps, I was not prepared for so remarkable an instance as had just taken place.

We found ourselves at least a quarter of a mile from the original spot. The farm-house and outbuildings were [illegible] which grew near the barn still occupied the same relative position to that building. The only change observable was, that a stream which flowed a little below the farm-houses had entirely disappeared.

The most singular result of this movement is that the farm offices of my friend Mr. Gourlay are no longer upon his own farm. They have been projected upon the lands of a totally different proprietor, and it is supposed that unless he manage to rent, in addition to his old farm, the portion of land on which his standing is now located, a good deal of nice litigation will be the consequence of this sudden and unexpected freak of Nature.

Iowa.—The Iowa Convention has fixed on Sullivan's line for the Southern boundary of the new State, which (the St. Louis Reporter thinks) Missouri will never assent to. Iowa city has been agreed upon as the seat of government until 1865. The Legislature is to be composed of 39 Representatives and 17 Senators. Application for admission into the Union will be made to Congress at its approaching session.

Wool-growing in North Carolina.—A gentleman much experienced in this business, who has traveled over the Western States, having had his attention drawn to the Western part of North Carolina, is about to transport his flock of sheep, purchased chiefly in Western Pennsylvania, to Asheville, N. C. This move, if successfully followed, will produce great results in that unproductive region. [Raleigh Register.

New Style of Robbers.—The house of William Mulford, four miles from Beckford, was lately entered by three persons in disguise, who said they were robbers by profession! and who demanded, with pistols at the breast of Mr. M. his money—which, after an unsuccessful effort on his part to get possession of a loaded gun that was in the house at the time, they obtained, amounting to 475 dollars. They then very deliberately counted it, to be sure of the exact amount they had obtained. [Chicago Jour.

Novel Adventure.—A young gentleman of Troy, while on his way up the Hudson in the Swallow, thrust himself, in his sleep, through the small window of his berth (in the forward cabin) until his feet touched the water. Coming out just in front of the paddle-wheel, where the spray moved rapidly, he awoke from his dreams, and found he was situated in the midst of a horrid reality. He could not crawl back, so he shouted for help, but nobody came; he then pounded on the window of the next berth, and finally roused up a person who gave the alarm. The Captain supposed it was some insane man, but lowered the boat, and the unfortunate gentleman was rescued from his extraordinary situation.

Poultry over the Stonington Railroad.—42,951 lbs from Westerly, 3,700 lbs from Richmond, 20,468 lbs from South Kingstown, 2,800 lbs from North Kingstown, were brought up this morning. The whole goes to Boston this afternoon to supply our Massachusetts friends for Thanksgiving. The whole number of pounds is 69,949. There will be about 5,000 lbs over the same road for Boston on Monday. [Providence Trans.

A fine new bell for a Baptist Church in Buffalo met with a narrow escape on Wednesday last. It had been hoisted just to the point desired, when the tackle parted, and the bell went down, breaking through both the principal and basement floors, and landed without injury.

THE FIRST MARTYR.

BY JOHN D. COLLINS.

Why, with grief and indignation
Pictured in each look and limb,
At their long-accustomed station,
Sit the sacred Sanhedrim?
Light divine has late descended,
Making free salvation known;
And, in death his sorrows ended,
Still Messiah claims his own.

Whom will they, their vengeance venting,
Next to condemnation call?
Selfish bigots, unrelenting,
Drag him to the judgement hall?
There arrainged, false, hireling creatures,
Are for witnesses brought in;
But a halo round his features
Contradicts the charge of sin.

Can their awful malice waken
Fear, promoting trai'rous deeds?
Lo! a champion, bold, unshaken;
Loud his Master's cause he pleads.
He directs their sequent vision
O'er the path their fathers trod;
Proving, to their late decision,
Jewish enmity to God.

With conviction, thrills compunction
Through that judicative band?
Will each judge discharge his function
As the holy laws demand?
No, alas! to hell disbursing
Priceless souls for pageant worth,—
Flushed with madness, gnashing, cursing,
Fierce they hurl their victim forth.

Does he, with a vulgar feeling,
Labor to avert the stroke?
Or, to righteous Heaven appealing,
Retribution just evoke?
Mark his meekness! view him rather Imitate a Saviour's course:
Here a lasting lesson gather,
Of redemption's healing force.

While with cruel lapidation
His existence they would close,
He, with wondrous resignation,
Asks forgiveness for his foes.
Gently, then, as dews descending
Sink upon the peaceful deep,
He, his soul to Grace commending,
Sweetly falls in Christ asleep.

Alfred, N. Y., 1844.

THE END OF THE WORLD.

We have no disposition to ridicule the faith of any man or set of men; nor would we willingly countenance those who seem to take pleasure in doing it. We have therefore refrained from publishing any of the ridiculous and absurb stories which have been circulated respecting the believers in the speedy termination of all terrestrial things. It is but just to expect, now that "the prophetic periods," as they are termed, have all passed, and the earth is seen to remain firm and undestroyed, that such persons will see their mistake, and re- [illegible] of showing them that they are not the first or only persons who have been thus disappointed, and also for the information of others who may be curious about the subject, the editor of the U. S. Saturday Post has very opportunely collected a list of similar disappointments, from which we make the following extract:—

Without referring to the delusion of the Jews, who looked for a temporal reign of Christ as an earthly potentate, or the mistaken among the early Christians, who confidently predicted the second advent of the Saviour as to occur at the end of the Roman Pagan Empire, giving him also an earthly kingdom; or to the manner in which the end of the crusades, and the victory of the Christians over the Moslems would establish that kingdom; we look to the later manifestations of the consequences of mistaking the promises of the gospel, and confounding things spiritual and temporal. It is sufficient to say, that the later delusion, are but a perpetuation of the error of those who, in early times, rose, and saying, "I am Christ," deceived many.

In the year 1212 it was perdicted and promised that the Mediterranean Sea should be dried up, that believers should pass to Jerusalem on foot, there to build up the new city. After what we have seen in our own time, it will readily be credited, that Italy was filled with pilgrims, waiting the drying up of the sea to commence their journey; and the misery which these persons suffered, and which they inflicted upon their friends and dependents by their infatuations, will easily be imagined.

In 1524, John Stoflerus, a mathematician and astrologer of Suabia, predicted a great deluge, and he was so far believed that those who owned land near the sea sold out at a great loss. Books were published giving cheap directions how to escape the inundation; and surveyors actually consulted the stars, and pointed out what places would be least exposed to the waters. Boats were built and placed on the tops of high pillars, in which the believers sat, with their families, waiting the waters to come and float them off. Many arches were contrived, with breathing holes in the top, in which men might live with the water around them, until the danger was passed away. The time fixed for the inundation proved to be a very dry season, and the water-proof contrivances were ruined by a continued drought. And notwithstanding the failure of this perdiction, we find that Stoflerus did not lose his faith; for he then set the final destruction of the world for the year 1586, and died prophesying it.

Meanwhile, Martin Strifelius predicted the end of the world to take place in 1533, giving the day and the hour. He was in his pulpit, preaching on the subject, when the time arrived, and his audience was waiting the consummation of all things, when a violent storm arose, and for a short time he and his people were full in the belief that all was over. The storm passed away—the sky was serene—the day was delightful—and the preacher was dragged from his desk and almost beaten to death.

William Hacket, in 1590, predicted the destruction of England, and had not a few followers. He claimed himself to be Monarch of Europe, and his followers proclaimed him. He was hanged for sedition—an argument which is not now used against error.

Walter Gostello, in 1658, foretold the restoration of Charles II., and the destruction of London. The first part of his prophecy being fulfilled gave him some credit as a prophet. The second part, it is hardly necessary to say, is as yet unaccomplished. Thomas Venner, who flourished about the same time, declared that earthly kings were all impostors, and attempted with a crowd of soldiers to take actual possession of the earth, in the name of the Lord; they were opposed by the soldiers. They fought like tigers, believing themselves invulnerable, but were overpowered by numbers, and Venner with twelve others, was hanged.

There were several such prophets in France in the seventh century—but one of the most remarkable of the seers of that era was John Mason, a minister of Water Stratford, near Buckingham, England. Mason believed himself Elias, and announced that Christ was shortly to appear on earth and fix his throne at Stratford. An immense concourse met at the time appointed, and with fiddles and other instruments, with dancing and other tumultuous signs of rejoicing, awaited the coronation. Poor Mason died in 1697, a full believer in the delusion that he had frequent conversations with the Saviour, and that his divine mission was confirmed.

Whiston the mathematician, was a believer in the immediate approach of the millennium and lived to see the failure of two predictions. Lord Napier, the inventor of the logarithms, also prophesied the end of the world, and outlived its term, as he had set it. Dr. Lloyd, Bishop of Worcester, at ninety years of age, went to Queen Anne, and prophesied that at the end of four years the King of France would turn Protestant, there would be a war of religion, and that papacy would be destroyed.

To come down to a later time. In 1761, two learned men arrived at Cologne, who conversed with the Jesuits of that city in Latin, Greek, Hebrew and Chaldaic. They gave out that they had come from Damascus, and were seven hundred years old; and prophesied that Constantinople would be destroyed in 1767, that the whole world would be shook by an earthquake in 1770, that the sun moon and stars would fall in 1771, and that the world would be burnt in 1772, and the general judgment take place in 1778.

In 1772 a hermit frightened the inhabitants of Trieste into the belief that the destruction of that city was immediately to take place, and so general was the faith with which his prediction was received, that the city was absolutely deserted to escape the destruction. But the day passed over without any calamity to any one except the unlucky prophet, for when his disciples returned to resume their buisness, they found the predictor of destruction had realized it in his own person. He was hanged by the proper authorities.

Towards the close of the seventeenth century, the whole court of France was thrown into terror, and people who had never prayed before began then, in the belief that the immediate destruction of the world was at hand. As the event did not verify their fears, and the world continued to stand, they made up for temporary self-denial by plunging anew into the worst excesses. The reaction made them infinitely greater sinners than they were before.

We have quoted the above facts—few, indeed among the very many which might be adduced, to remind the reader that this is "no new thing under the sun." We are inclined to think that with [illegible] expectations cannot be kept up forever, delusions of this particular description will cease, and men will no longer strive to be wise above what is written. Whether the end of the whole world occur, sooner or later, is of little individual consequence to any of us; for death must happen at some time, and is as likely to occur soon as late; and death to the individual is an end of the world so far as he or she is concerned. We do not think of preparing for that by waiting in idleness—nor should any think to prepare for the end of all things, in any other way than by a continuance in the performance of our duties to our Maker, to our fellows, and to ourselves.

AN EXCELLENT CUSTOM.

In Munich, Germany, all boys found in the streets asking alms, are taken to an asylum established for that purpose. As soon as they enter the door, and before having been cleansed, or their clothes removed, a portrait of each one is taken, representing him in the same form as when found begging. When the portrait is finished, he is cleansed, and presented with a new and neat suit of clothes. After going through a regular course of education, appointed by the directors of the asylum, they are put to learn a trade, at which they work until they have earned enough to liquidate all their expenses from the first day they entered the institution. When this is completed, they are dismissed from the institution, to gain their own livelihood. At the same time, the portrait taken is presented to them, which they vow they will preserve as long as they live, in order that they may remember the abject condition from which they have been redeemed, and the obligations which they are under to the institution for having saved them from misery, and given them means of feeding themselves for the future. Such an institution might do good here.

SARDINIAN MODEL PRISON.

In this prison there are about 900 convicts, managed by a hundred and fifty overseers. They are kept in long halls, well aired and well lighted. Thus in six halls the whole 900 are arranged for the night in two files, each provided with clothing, blankets, &c. together with thread and needles, and a little account book, and prayer book. The whole are divided into four classes, according to the nature of their crimes. Each of these four classes are again divided into three parts, according to the conduct of the individuals under discipline and the term of years for which they are sentenced. With those condemned for life are placed the intractiable, and those who have relapsed the second time. Each class is distinguished by its dress. As the conduct of one improves he is elevated from one rank to another, and vice versa. An extraordinary, generous action, is rewarded by immediate elevation, and thus a constant stimulus is given to the dormant virtue in the crminal. This has been found to work well, bringing a large proportion into the first rank. The best of the first rank are selected out (called "Mozzi de Bagni") who retain only one ring of their chain, and receive, when not employed in work, two cents a day. Not given for wages, this is designed as a premium for good behavior. They are also placed as a sort of under overseer to preserve discipline and subordination among the rest. In cases of misconduct the criminal would prefer a hundred lashes to being degraded from his rank and sent to labor with those he had regarded as his inferiors. Wages are also given for work on the principle that labor loses most of its benefit when divided from its natural reward.

Under this system of motive, and punishment and reward, the furious become obedient and the thief honest, and what virtues are left in man stimulated and strengthened.

Here are beautiful sentences from the pen of Coleridge. Nothing can be more eloquent—nothing more true:—

"Call not that man wretched, whatever else he suffers as to pain inflicted, or pleasure denied who has a child for whom he hopes, and on whom he doats. Poverty may grind him to the dust, obscurity may cast its darkest mantle over him, his voice may be unheeded by those among whom he dwells, and his face may be unknown to his neighbors; even pain may rack his joints and sleep flee from his pillow, but he has a gem with which he would not part for wealth defying computation, for fame filling a world's ear, for the sweetest sleep that ever fell on mortal's eye."

Fruits of Spiritual Tyranny.—During the reign of Charles II., nearly eight thousand Protestants Dissenters perished in prison, for no other crime than that of dissenting from the Church of England. This is not a random guess, but a list of the sufferers carefully collected at the time, by a Mr. White; who received the thanks of the bishops for not exposing the black record in the succeeding reign of James, when it might have been made the instrument of terrible retribution upon the Episcopal party.

Latimer's Preaching.—Of the carnestness of Latimer's manner of preaching we have the following specimen in a sermon delivered at court against the corruptions of the age.

"Take heed and beware of covetousness! take heed and beware of covetousness! take heed and beware of covetousness! And what! if I should say nothing else for three or four hours but these words? Great complaints there are of it, and much crying out, and much preaching, but little amendment that I can see. Covetousness is the root of all evil. Then have at the root. Out with your swords, ye preachers, and strike at the root. Stand not pruning and toying with the branches, for new boughs will spring out again; but strike at the root and fear not these great men, these men of power, fear them not, but strike at the root."

Two pointed Texts.—Rev. William Jay, of Bath, England, recently preached before the London Missionary Society a sermon from the single sentence, 'Ebenezer,' on which he preached nearly two hours to a large and attentive audience. The Rev. Mr. Raffles, of Liverpool, preached in another chapel also from a single sentence, "Forward."

Heaven.—Talking of Heaven, reminds us of a droll circumstance that occurred lately in one of the small towns on the Alabama river, about a hundred miles above Mobile, which latter place is of course the metropolis of all that section of country. A little girl, who had been hearing a good deal about Heaven at church, asked her mother with much earnestness, "which is the greatest place, Heaven or Mobile?" She told the inquisitive juvenile there was no comparison between the [illegible] vor of the former. "I did'nt know," said the provoking little innocent, "but what Mobile was, because I hear it a heap more talked about."

George III.—It is said the King, after the close of the American Revolutionary war, ordered a thanksgiving to be kept throughout the United Kingdom. A noble Scotch divine, in the presence of his majesty, inquired, "for what are we to give thanks, that your majesty has lost thirteen of his best provinces?" The King answered, "No!" "Is it then (the divine added) that your majesty has lost 100,000 lives of your subjects in the contest?" "No, no!" said the King. "Is it then, that we have expended and lost a hundred millions of money, and for the defeat and tarnishing of your majesty's army?" "No such thing!" answered the King pleasantly. "What then is the object of thanksgiving?" "Oh, give thanks that it is no worse!"

The Connecticut Historical Society has recently come into possession of the identical deal chest, formerly owned by Elder Brewster, the celebrated companion of Rev. Dr. Robinson and the rest of the Pilgrims who landed at Plymouth in 1620. The chest was brought over in the May Flower, and is identified not only by its original marks, but by other satisfactory testimony. It has always remained in possession of the lineal descendants of the Elder. It passed from him into the hands of his son William Brewster, thence into the possession of his grandson Joseph Brewster, and afterward into the possession of his great grand daughter, Ruth Brewster, who married Mr. William Sampson, and removed to West Springfield in Massachusetts, where she died, a few years since, at a great age, in the family of Henry Day, from whom Dr. Robbins procured it. It is made of Norway Pine, and was probably procured in Holland.

The Far West Seminary.—This is the title of an Institution, which the friends of learning and religion are endeavoring to establish three miles from Fayetteville, Arkansas. This town is in Washington county, in the N. W. corner of Arkansas, a district intersected by the Ozark mountains, where there are a few slaves, and where the people raise their own wool and cotton, and manufacture it for themselves. The Cherokees are within 25 miles, and the Choctaws are within 45; it is a leading purpose of the Seminary to instruct the Indians. Arkansas, as yet, has no College, and we hope this effort will succeed.

War and Grammar.—Thomas Carlyle, in his vivid account of the battle of Monmouth, conducted on the American side by Washington in person, says:

"It was a bloody conjunction, or rather conjugation of carnage. Men of kindred blood, men speaking the same noble language, met in the death grapple. It was—I kill, thou killest, he kills; we kill, you kill, they kill."

Horrors of the Slave Trade.—The South African Commercial Advertiser of the 27th of January, says, that in some of the slaving vessels recently captured, the space between the decks, where the living cargo was stowed away, was so small that young children, boys and girls from eight to twelve years of age, could not creep in on their hands and knees—they were pushed in, or lying flat on their faces crawled in like worms!

Cold Water Cure.—This Prussian mode of cure is exciting considerable attention. It has been introduced among the Shakers of Lebanon, N. Y. A long sufferer from scrofula commenced on the 1st of June by using the cold wet sheet arranged to become quickly warm by the heat of the body, with bandages on the head—he remained all night in the sheets—bathed three times a day—drank 5 tumblers of soft water per day—continued the system a month—biles broke out over him, but they are now all healed and the patient is well and takes no cold. A boy of 14, with a loathsome constitutional hereditary joint, a cripple and a loathsome object, is now entirely cured by the same means. Many other cases of cure are noticed.

Simple Cure for the Croup.—We find in the Journal of Health the following simple remedy for this dangerous disease. If a child is taken with the croup, instantly apply cold water, ice water if possible, suddenly and freely to the neck and chest with a sponge—the breathing will almost instantly be relieved; so soon as possible let the sufferer drink as much as it can, then wipe it dry, cover it up warm, and soon a quiet slumber will follow.

New Butter Churn.—Application has been made, says the Cultivator, for a patent for a butter churn on an entirely new principle, which, if report speaks true, is to do away with every other mode. The plan is to blow a current of air, contained in a tin or other vessel, after the manner of boiling by means of steam, the air being raised by a machine, to be worked by hand in the simplest and easiest manner. By this means the butter is said not only to come in a short space of time, but always regularly adding about one half to the quality. An equal temperature is to be kept up by blowing cold air in the summer and hot in the winter.

The following directions for cleansing silks are by one of the first Parisian dyers: Half a pound of soft soap, a teaspoonful of brandy, and a pint of gin; mix all well together; with a sponge or flannel spread the mixture on each side of the silk without creasing it; wash it in two or three waters, and iron it on the wrong side—it will then look as good as new.

Paper Mills.—There are at this time upward of 600 paper mills in the United States, in full operation, with a capital of $16,000,000, and giving maintenance to upward of 60,000 persons.

It was the custom of the Spartans to use scarlet for the military dresses, to prevent the sight of their blood from operating as an encouragement to the enemy. This is the origin of the scarlet military coat.

It is ascertained that the profits, after paying all expenses, of the English penny postage system, amount to three millions of dollars annually. The franking privilege is entirely abolished. The Queen herself has to purchase her penny stamps.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. Kenyon, as Principal, and Miss Caroline B. Maxson, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

Tuition, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

A VISIT TO EPHRATA, PA.

For eight years past, I have had occasional correspondence with Dr. WM. M. FAHNESTOCK, a member of the German Seventh-day Baptist Church at Ephrata, Pa. A few weeks since, I received a letter from him, giving me a kind invitation to attend an annual festival to be held at that place, to commence Nov. 15th, at evening.

After advising with my brethren, and making necessary arrangements, I went to New Brunswick on the morning of the 14th of November, and took my passage in the cars for Philadelphia, where I arrived at 3 o'clock P. M. I tarried there with my friends until 12 o'clock at night, when I again seated myself in the cars for Lancaster, Pa. This was an unpleasant route, by an old lumber car, which runs at that hour to carry the mails west—and the dreariness of the scene, the darkness of the night, the drowsiness of my fellow travelers, and their disinclination to be sociable, rendered the ride tedious and wearisome. But before day-light appeared, we were comfortably seated by a warm fire in Lancaster. At the hotel I found in the morning some German friends on their way to Ephrata to attend the meeting. There being no public conveyance from this place, I was under the necessity of hiring a private carriage to take me the distance of thirteen miles.

While on my journey, I had many misgivings as to the propriety of my mission. The people among whom I was going were all strangers to me, as I had never seen an individual of them. They were Germans, to whom, therefore, I should be a barbarian, and they would be barbarians to me. But trusting in God, who had always been my help, I went forward, and reached Ephrata about 12 o'clock, just as the friends who had arrived there were dining at the old monastery. I was very cordially received, all former fears vanished, and I soon felt that I was among my Father's family. During the afternoon, we were busied in the reception of friends, who were arriving constantly from different parts of the State, to attend the anniversary appointed to be held at their ancient Jerusalem. It may be proper here to give a description of that ancient institution, and the people that I have been to visit.

The founder of this community was one CONRAD BEISSEL, a native of Germany, formerly a Presbyterian, who, in company with others, fled from the hands of persecutors to the wilds of Pennsylvania in 1719. They took up their abode at Germantown, and formed a church, now known as the Dunkers, or First-day German Baptists. Beissel was an honest Christian, and wholly intent upon learning the will of God as revealed in his Word, that he might attend to all its rites and ceremonies, stripped of the inventions of men. He found that there was an error among his brethren respecting the day that they observed as a Sabbath; that God had commanded the observance of the seventh day as the weekly Sabbath; that it was to be observed forever; and that no change or authority for a change had ever been revealed to man. Having imbibed these views, he commenced advocating this truth; and about the year 1725 he published a tract upon the subject. This caused some excitement and disturbance in the church of which he was a member, in consequence of which he left the church, and took up his abode in a solitary cave on the banks of the Cocalico Creek, which had previously been the abode of a hermit. When his place of retirement became known, many of his brethren who had embraced his views settled around him, in rude huts which they built with their own hands. In the year 1728 they formed into a society, adopted the true Sabbath, the seventh day of the week, which has been observed ever since by them as a people.

In the year 1732, their solitary life was changed into a Monastic Society; and the buildings erected for that purpose are many of them yet standing, for the admiration of the stranger. In this enterprise God prospered them, so that in 1740 there were thirty-six single brethren in the brother house, and in the female cloister there were thirty-five sisters. When I arrived at the spot, I could but admire and wonder. Here is an enclosure of four or five acres, in which those ancient buildings stand. They were erected in 1733. They consist of the old meeting-house with three galleries, which is yet standing, but in ruins. Adjoining this is the brother-house, a house about forty feet by eighty, and three stories high. These buildings are erected in the cheapest and plainest style. The halls passing through in different directions are so narrow, that if two should meet, one must retreat. The building is divided into convenient rooms to accommodate its occupants; but for years it has been unoccupied by those for whom it was designed. There are a few families living in it for the present. A little above this stands a small building with a high steeple, which was formerly the residence of the physician. In the steeple was a clock, which is now upon the school-house. Near by stands another dwelling, which was the parsonage, or house in which the minister lived. Above this stands a large building. In entering it we pass a small portico, and the door is so low as to make it necessary to stoop as we enter. But the objects which strike the eye show one that this is the house of God. Six tables are arranged so as to reach nearly the whole length of the room, with convenient seats, as many as are necessary, with a stand and table a little elevated on one side of the room for the accommodation of the speaker. Hanging to the walls are eight inscriptions, made with a pen in large German letters, being passages of Scripture urging to duty. There are six of this character which are in frames, written on paper, the sheets being about one yard square. There is one describing the strait and the crooked way; and another describing the three heavens, with their inhabitants. They have been hanging against those walls for near a century. The room is about forty feet square. It was formerly the sisters' dining-room and prayer-room. It is now the place of their meeting. A part of the same building is used for putting up their dishes, provisions, and other necessaries for their meals, and is furnished accordingly. Near this is a stone building, used for cooking and washing purposes, about the size of a common dwelling house. The sister-house is adjoining to the meeting-room, about the size of the brother-house, of similar form, and is still occupied by five aged ladies, who are the only remaining members of the convent. They have many relics of antiquity, which are preserved as objects of curiosity. The cap worn by the sisters in the early days of the institution, is carefully preserved. In addition to these buildings, there are a number of private dwellings, occupied by families, but which are fast going to ruins. In the corner of the yard, adjoining the turnpike, stands the academy, a new building, two stories high, with a steeple, bell, and clock. Schools are taught in this building, male and female. These buildings are the property of the Society, with 120 acres of land, a grist-mill and saw-mill. A number of buildings that were occupied in the days of their prosperity, are now in ruins, and nothing remains but the marks of their decay.

A few days after the battle of Brandywine, Sept. 11, 1777, four or five hundred of the wounded soldiers were brought to Ephrata, and placed in the hospital there. Doctors Yerkel, Scott, and Harrison, were the attending surgeons and physicians. The wounds and camp-fever baffled their skill. One hundred and fifty of the soldiers died here. They were principally from the eastern states and Pennsylvania, and a few British who had deserted and joined the American army. The place where they rest is enclosed, and for many years it was marked by a board with an inscription. The board with the inscription is no more. (History of Lancaster County.)

In the burying-ground which belongs to the Society are the tombs of the ancient fathers, with suitable marble monuments erected to their memory. That of their founder attracted my attention; a large table stone covers the grave, marked with German letters. I was unable to read them, but a friend informed me of the following: "Aged fifty-two; natural life seventy-seven."

At present there are but few here who keep the Sabbath. They have been for many years on the decrease, and for twenty years without a minister; and it cannot be expected that a church will prosper without this appointed means of grace. Worship is attended by a few on the evening and morning of each Sabbath. But in other parts of the State there are flourishing societies which have originated from the one at Ephrata.

Soon after sundown the meeting-house was filled. The choir, consisting of the members of the Monastery in Franklin County, were seated in front of the stand. Elder Fahnestock, the pastor of that institution, commenced the meeting with a hymn, and a number of prayers were then offered to God. He then addressed us in German from the twelfth chapter of Romans. After singing, Elder King, from Bedford County, spoke in English, followed by myself. The meeting was to me one of interest. Their singing was melodious. They are masters in music; each one who sings has his note-book in his hands; and much of their religious exercise is singing the praises of God. Their music-books are in German, and written with a pen.

Sabbath morning breakfast was served at eight o'clock at the monastery, a large number being present to partake of this religious feast. After eating, a short season was spent in singing and prayer. At ten o'clock the house was filled with attentive worshipers. Elder Fahnestock preached in German, from the fifth chapter of Ephesians, followed by Elder King in English, upon the sufferings of Christ. By the request of the ministers, I spoke to them upon the subject of Sabbath-keeping. After this a number of pieces were sung, prayer offered, and the meeting closed.

At three o'clock P. M., dinner was made ready, and not less than one hundred and fifty sat down at the first table, which was bountifully loaded with all the necessaries of life. The whole number that partook with us at that meal was three hundred and fifty. This was their anciently-celebrated Love Feast.

At sun-down the house was again filled; and by six o'clock some hundreds had assembled who could not be accommodated within the house. After some introductory exercises, and some appropriate remarks, the ancient practice of "washing one another's feet," was attended to. I have always been favorable to this practice, and many of my brethren know that it is my wish that it might still be observed in the church. With pleasure I united with them in the exercise, and have reason to believe that I was doing my Master's will. After some further exercises, the Lord's Supper was administered in the most plain and simple manner. Everything present, their forms, manner of address, and their customs, all bore the marks of antiquity and apostolic times.

There was no public announcement for meeting on the next morning, although it was understood that the brethren and sisters would then hold a parting meeting, as their friends would then leave for home. We met for breakfast at seven o'clock; and at eight we met for prayers. A parting address was delivered in German by our father in the Gospel, the effect of which was seen in the flowing tears of many. Myself and others likewise spoke. We then commended ourselves to God in prayer, and bade each other an affectionate farewell, never expecting all to meet again in this world. Our friends from the west then mounted their carriages (which stood at the door) and departed. The remainder of the day I spent with these friends, and as notice had been given that I would preach to them in the evening in English, a crowded assembly met at an early hour, and I preached to them probably for the last time.

The next morning, at an early hour, I started in company with Dr. Fahnestock and family, to return to my home and the people of my charge. I shall long remember the kindness, and the warmth of heart, with which I was received by this people, though to them a stranger, and my language to a few of them equally strange. There are, however, but few among them at present who cannot both understand and converse in English. I hope that I may have the satisfaction of visiting that people again, believing that in their destitute situation good may be done, and souls converted to God.

The number of those who profess religion is small in comparison to the dense population of the country. In their general religious sentiments, I consider them to be orthodox. Trine immersion and feet-washing are practiced by them; but no one could consider this to be heresy. Some writers have charged them with Unitarianism, but if I am not deceived, the charge is unjust. They have been accused of being Universalists by some historians. The Dunker German Baptists, who are numerous in that country, many of them hold to that sentiment. But those Seventh-day Societies, I think, are free from it, if I could understand their ministers to express the sentiments of the people generally. The tracts and papers that I took were received with thankfulness. I obtained five subscribers for the Recorder, and five dollars for the Tract Society.

W. B. GILLETT.

GOD IS NOT DEAD.

There lived in the east of Scotland, a pious clergyman who had presided, for a number of years, over a small but respectable congregation. In the midst of his active career of usefulness, he was suddenly removed by death, leaving behind him a wife, and a number of helpless children.

The small stipend allowed him by his congregation, had been barely sufficient to meet the current expenses of his family; and at his death no visible means were left for their support. The death of her husband preyed deeply upon the heart of the poor afflicted widow, while the dark prospect which the future presented, filled her mind with the most gloomy apprehensions. By her lonely fireside she sat—the morning after her bereavement—lamenting her forlorn condition, when her little son, a boy of five years of age, entered the room. Seeing the deep distress of his mother, he stole softly to her side, and placing his little hand in hers, looked wistfully into her face, and said; "Mother, mother, is God dead?" Soft as the gentle whisper of an angel, did the simple accent of the dear boy fall upon the ear of the disconsolate, and almost broken-hearted mother. A gleam of heavenly radiance lighted up, for a moment her pale features. Then snatching up her little boy, and pressing him fondly to her bosom, she exclaimed: "No, no, my son, God is not dead; he lives and has promised to be a father to the fatherless, a husband to the widow. His promises are sure and steadfast, and upon them I will firmly and implicitly rely." Her tears were dried, and her murmurings forever hushed. The event proved that her confidence was not misplaced. The congregation over whom her husband had worthily presided, generously settled upon her a handsome annuity, by which she was enabled to support her family, not only comfortably, but even genteelly. The talents of her sons, as they advanced in years, soon brought them into notice, and finally procured them high stations in society.

ACCEPTABLE WORSHIP.

BY WILLIAM H. BURLEIGH.

Not worthiest is his worship who afar
  Retired from crowds, in meditation deep,
  Passes his days beyond the maddened sweep
Of stormy passions and the angry jar
Of clashing interests, that naught may mar
  His inward peace, though all his hours are given
  To prayer and penitence and dreams of heaven—
Nor his whose set responses are
  In the full temple, when the many kneel
  To utter forms the spirit does not feel—
For not in words, tho' breathed from tongues of flame,
  Is the full heart of love revealed the best;
  Nor in muttered thoughts that fill the breast
With quiet, and the bounding pulses tame.

ACTION—untiring, earnest, bold and free,
  Its Impulse, Love—its object, Truth and Right—
  By holy zeal sustained—by heavenly light
Directed ever, though thick darkness be
Over the earth, and men no longer see
  The Soul's great birthright—ACTION, such as this,
  Is holiest worship,—and a purer bliss
Attends the offering, than the devotee
  Of forms can know. Words, offspring of the brain,
  High-sounding yet not heart-born, are in vain—
The heart turns loathing from them that hath known
  The baptism of the Spirit—turns, to find
  Its joy in DOING—deeming thus His mind
Hath Christ, our Head and great Exemplar, shown.

Wouldst thou, then, offer, with a willing mind,
  A sacrifice acceptable to Him
  Before whose throne adoring Seraphim
Bend with veiled faces?—Labor for thy kind—
Uphold the feeble and direct the blind—
  Reclaim the wandering—the lost restore—
  And bid the erring go and sin no more—
Live for Humanity, and thou shalt find
  Peace which the selfish heart can never know;
  Joys that from holy action only, flow,
Be bold for Truth—though all the world despise—
  Be strong in Right—though all the world oppose—
  Be free in love—though all men are thy foes—
And God will smile upon thy sacrifice!

"WHAT FRUIT HAD YE IN THOSE THINGS?"

Lord Chesterfield, the celebrated worldling, has borne as emphatic testimony to the vanity of this world as we remember to have read. Says he, "I have run the silly round of business and pleasure, and I have done with them all. I have enjoyed all the pleasures of the world, and consequently know their futility, and do not regret their loss. I apprize them at their real value, which is, in truth, very low; whereas, those who have not experienced them, always overrate them. They only see their gay outsides, and are dazzled with their glare. But I have been behind the scenes; I have seen all, the coarse pulleys and dirty ropes which move and exhibit the gaudy machinery. I have seen and smelt the tallow candles which illuminate the whole decoration, to the astonishment and admiration of an ignorant multitude. When I reflect upon what I have seen, and what I have heard and done, I can hardly persuade myself that all that frivolous hurry, and bustle, and pleasure of the world, had any reality; but I look upon all that has passed as one of those romantic dreams which opium commonly occasions; and I do by no means wish to repeat the nauseous dose for the sake of the fugitive dream."

Lord Byron declared, that, upon the most careful recollection of his experience of life, of joy and sorrow from childhood onward, he could not recall but eleven days in which he enjoyed himself, and which he could wish to live over again. There can be no doubt of the entire sincerity of the declarations of Byron and Chesterfield, and as little reason to doubt their truth. When, then, we reflect upon the eminent opportunities of these witnesses to make the most of this world, and enjoy it to their heart's content, we must see the overwhelming force of their conclusion, that the world, taken as a portion, is very vanity and delusion.

It is a very observable fact, that they mourn the most about the delusiveness of the world who have gone deepest into it, and had the largest share of it. Not your beggar with his bone and rags, but your Byrons, Chesterfields, and Solomons, who have from infancy had every temporal good to satiety. These are they who in the bitterest spirit cry out "vanity of vanities."

Equally true and worthy of reflection is it, that those who seek but little here below, find much. We expect there have been very few lively Christians who have found the world so barren as Byron found it. They have found this world to answer a very good purpose, and yield them many enjoyments. But the secret of this has been that they sought the kingdom of God first, and the world last, in its proper place and for its legitimate uses.

THE DOCTRINE OF ELECTION.

An individual said to Dr. Nettleton, "I cannot get along with the doctrine of election." "Then," said he, "get along without it. You are at liberty to get to heaven the easiest way you can. Whether the doctrine is true or not, it is true that you must repent, and believe, and love God. Now what we tell you, is, that such is the wickedness of your heart, that you will never do these things, unless God has determined to renew your heart. If you do not believe that your heart is so wicked, make it manifest by complying with the terms of salvation. Why do you stand caviling with the doctrine of election? Suppose you should prove it to be false; what have you gained? You must repent and believe in Christ after all. Why do you not immediately comply with these terms of the Gospel. When you have done this, without the aids of divine grace, it will be soon enough to oppose the doctrine of election. Until you shall have done this, we shall still believe that the doctrine of election lies at the foundation of all hope in your case."

Fifty years since in this country, there was one Catholic Bishop, and twenty-five priests of this denomination. Now we have twenty-one Bishops and nearly one thousand Priests, with seven hundred churches, and about five hundred missionary stations.

THE UNBELIEVER.

I pity the unbeliever—one who can gaze upon the grandeur, the glory, and beauty of the natural universe, and behold not the touches of His finger, who is over, and with, and above all:—from my heart I do commiserate his condition. The unbeliever! on whose intellect the light of revelation never penetrated; who can gaze upon the sun, moon, and stars, and upon the unfading and imperishable sky, spread out so magnificently above him, and say all this is the work of chance. The heart of such a being is a dull and cheerless void. In him mind—the god-like gift of intellect—is debased, destroyed; all is dark, a fearful, chaotic labyrinth, rayless, cheerless, hopeless! No gleam of light penetrates the blackness of the horrible delusion! No voice from the Eternal bids the desponding heart rejoice!

No fancied tones from the harps of seraphim arouse the dull spirit from its lethargy, or allay the consuming fever of the brain. The wreck of mind is utterly remediless; reason is prostrate, and passion, prejudice, and superstition, have reared their temple on the ruins of his intellect.

I pity the unbeliever. What to him is the revelation from on high, but a sealed book? He sees nothing above, or around, or beneath him, that evinces the existence of a God; and he denies—yes, while standing on the foot-stool of Omnipotence, and gazing upon the dazzling throne of Jehovah, he shuts his intellect to the light of reason, and denies there is a God.

THE SEASONS.

You will agree with Old Humphrey, that Spring is a pleasant time; and when the sun is shining, the flowers blooming, the green trees waving, the birds singing, the balmy breeze blowing, the spirit rejoices, and the lips burst into a song.

Summer is a pleasant time, when the noon-tide ray gilds up the woods, the waters, and the mountain-tops; when the air is filled with odors, and the laugh of the merry haymakers is heard in the meads.

Autumn is a pleasant time, and we cannot look without gladness on the golden grain, and the laden fruit trees, the varied foliage, and the kindling heavens.

Winter is a pleasant time to all who are hardy enough to walk abroad when the frosted snow lies on the ground, and the trees are hung fantastically with rime; for then wonder is awakened in the mind, and the pure, sharp, bracing air gives cheerfulness to the spirit.

Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter, are pleasant seasons, and if any thing can make them more pleasant, it is the heartfelt remembrance that they are the gift of God. Yes, He who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with a span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and hills in a balance; He, with whom the nations are as a drop of a bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the balance, who "taketh up the isles as a very little thing;" for whom "Lebanon is not sufficient to burn, nor the beasts thereof sufficient for a burnt offering;" He has given them to me. And what have I given in return? The fragments of my feelings, and the mere shreds of the joyous days and peaceful nights He has bestowed on me.

Oh let me then with all my powers,
  Prolong his sacred praise,
Through Spring and Summer's rosy hours,
  And Autumn's pleasant days.

And when the keener wintry skies
  Shall freeze the sterile ground,
Then let the hallelujahs rise,
  Then more and more abound.

NEVER TOO LATE.

BY MISS BREMER.

Ah! that I could be heard by all oppressed, dejected souls! I would cry to them—"lift up your heads, and confide still in the future, and believe that it is never too late! See! I too was bowed down by long suffering, and old age had moreover overtaken me, and I believed that all my strength had vanished; that my life, and my sufferings, were in vain—and behold! my head has again been lifted up, my heart appeased, my soul strengthened; and now, in my fiftieth year, I advance into a new future, attended by all that life has beautiful and worthy of love."

The change in my soul has enabled me better to comprehend life and suffering, and I am now firmly convinced "that there is no fruitless suffering, and that no virtuous endeavor is in vain."

Winter days and nights may bury beneath their pall of snow the sown corn; but when the spring arrives, it will be found equally true, that "there grows much bread in the winter night."

TRUTH.

The true Christian loves the truth for its own sake—and not simply for the influence it gives him over his fellow man. If by preaching a falsehood, he could convert thousands, and by the truth he could convert none till the day of his death, he would still hold fast to the truth.

It is indeed lamentable to see how little respect for truth there is in the church at the present day. It must ever give way to good policy. Let a man declare to many churches, that a doctrine is not true, that many have proved it to be false, twenty times, and they will stare as though he was speaking blasphemy.

EPITAPH.—The following epitaph is found on a stone in the old burying-ground at Watertown, Massachusetts:—

"Here lies the precious dust of Thomas Bailey.

A faithful preacher,	A most desirable neighbor,
An eminent liver,	A pleasant companion,
A tender husband,	A common good,
A careful father,	A cheerful doer,
A brother for adversity,	A patient sufferer,
A faithful friend,	Lived much in a little time.

THE LAW AND THE GOSPEL.

BEARING OF THE GOSPEL UPON THE LAW.

It is a doctrine taught in the Bible and confirmed by observation, that all men have broken the law of God and thereby exposed themselves to his displeasure and punishment. They have all lived for themselves; they have all neglected to render to God the worship which is his due; they have all, in their intercourse with each other, neglected his law and followed the devices of their own hearts. This has not been their course occasionally, or in their early history alone; it has uniformly been their course from the first, and they now continue in it. Every day, therefore, has added to their accumulated guilt, and served to confirm them in their evil ways. In these circumstances, the probability of their return to duty and to God has been constantly diminishing. Even the occasional struggles of an individual to break away from the control of his sins, have only served to show the power they have over him, and the danger and extent of his departure from the right way. They have shown him to be without strength in himself, and undeserving of the help of another; and they have thus left him, with the violated law of God frowning upon him, with his conscious weakness paining him, and no door of hope apparently open before him.

But now a plan of salvation is proposed, by which God may be just, and yet the justifier of sinners. This is through an atoning sacrifice. A divine being—the only-begotten Son of God—undertakes the work. He assumes the nature of men, and appears among them. To the trials and temptations which beset them, he becomes subject; and to the law which has been given them, in its fullest extent and spirituality, he yields a perfect obedience. Every act of his life, therefore, is a commentary upon the law, and every word goes to enforce obedience to it. But perfect obedience is not all that is required of him, since such is the permanency and strictness of the law, that this is necessary for himself alone. Something more is essential to his making atonement for sin. Hence we see him direct his steps towards Jerusalem, and hear him speak cheerfully of the offering which he was there to make—an offering for making which he was prepared by his own perfection, and by his uniting the divine with human nature. In the holy city, among the monuments of God's former dispensations to men, and surrounded by those who had enjoyed the benefit of such dispensations, he speaks of his high origin and the designs of his mission; and finally, he seals the truth of his words, and completes the work for which he was anointed, by a death on the cross to atone for the sins of men. Thus the law was obeyed, a sacrifice offered, and a door of hope for man opened.

Now comes in the promise of the Gospel, that "he that believeth shall be saved;"—in other words, that such as look with an eye of faith to the righteousness and atonement of Christ may find pardon. Faith in Christ is made a condition on which hangs their salvation. That obedience which they have not rendered, and that atonement for sin which they could not make, has been provided by another; and it is for this reason, and for no other, that they have hope. The law is not made void by the faith of the Gospel, but the faith of the Gospel is the medium through which they receive the benefit of Christ's perfect obedience to the law and atoning sacrifice for sin. At the same time, the precepts of Christ enforce obedience to the law; his death on the cross shows its inviolable nature; and his example teaches men, that "denying ungodliness and worldly lusts," they should "live righteously, soberly, and godly, in this present evil world."

Where, then, lies the difference? Right here, that while the law continues to be a rule of life, obedience to it ceases to be looked to as a ground of justification. All our repentings and reformations, our good works and strivings, do not constitute for us the justifying righteousness we need. We are justified alone through the death of Christ, which makes it right for God to justify all who believe in him. Christ wrought out a righteousness as perfect as the law of God, and suffered likewise the penalty of man's transgression. When the Gospel offers us the benefit of this righteousness and atonement, it magnifies the law and makes it honorable.

SELF-SUPPORTING MISSIONS.

A movement is going on in the Sandwich Islands, of which not much is said, but which is destined to exert an important influence. Some two or three years ago, several missionaries from this country became convinced that they were doing wrong to receive support from churches which countenanced slavery. They therefore asked and received their dismission from the service of a society under the direction of such churches. When thus left without support, they determined, instead of returning to their native land, to rely upon the voluntary contributions of those among whom they labored. It was felt to be a hazardous experiment, after the people had become accustomed to enjoy religious instruction without pay. But the result has shown the wisdom of their course. The people have come to feel, that they are debtors, and ought to sustain the gospel; that God commands it; that the reflex influence is most useful; that they value the privileges more when they pay for them; and that they can easily do it. They have become stronger themselves; have supported the preachers well; and are now sending money to this country for benevolent purposes. Their example is worthy of the consideration and imitation of churches in our own land. Its influence will not be lost.

"NATIONAL LORD'S DAY CONVENTION."

[Carefully compiled from the Baltimore daily papers.]

The Convention was called to order by Bishop Waugh. After the usual formalities of such occasions, a committee was appointed to nominate permanent officers for the convention, who soon reported Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS as President, with seven Vice Presidents and four Secretaries.

Mr. Adams, on being conducted to the platform, expressed his gratitude for the honor conferred upon him, his opinion of the importance of a day of rest, and his desire to further the objects of the convention, which was received with applause.

After the adoption of rules for the Convention, and reading a letter from Mr. Frelinghuysen, the business committee reported a series of resolutions, expressing gratitude to God for appointing the Sabbath and blessing those who keep it; noticing with favor the strictness of the "fathers of our country" in observing the day of rest; recommending the imitation of all that was good in their example; mentioning the good influence of the Lord's day upon social and religious institutions; asserting a great improvement in the manner of keeping the Christian Sabbath; and approving the course of such editors as have exerted an influence in favor of the Lord's day.

These resolutions in several places contained the terms "Sabbath," and "Lord's Day," which were used indiscriminately. When, therefore, the first resolution was read for adoption—

Mr. Richard Lemmon objected to the phraseology used with regard to the observance of the Sabbath, asserting that the committee should give the word of God as a data for all they say. When Christ threw abroad his banner of love, he gave no instructions as to the observance of the Sabbath—no such day was mentioned. He would ask the committee where were the instructions in the apostolic law for the observance of the Jewish Sabbath? If the committee intended to direct them on this subject, he for one, and doubtless others present, would at once retire from the convention. He would not, as a member of the convention, acknowledge the obligations of the Jewish Sabbath.

The gentleman was called to order by several voices, and the authority whereby he claimed a seat in the convention demanded.

A member remaked, that if they were to be called on to settle the differences of opinion between the "First Day Baptists" and the "Seventh Day Baptists," they had better at once adjourn and go home.

Mr Lemmon said that he was here by special and personal invitation, and had he not been personally invited, he would not probably have been here. That invitation did not contain the word "Sabbath;" if it had, he would not have attended. He did not come here to discuss the question between First Day and Seventh Day Baptists, but to adhere to the command of the Lord on the subject of the observance of his holy day. (Cries of order!)

Hereupon a desultory discussion arose in relation to the right to raise the question of the particular day of the week, which should be kept as the Lord's day. It was contended generally by the speakers, that the call for the convention specified the duty which was to be performed—which was, to devise measures to promote the more strict observance of the Christian Sabbath. Therefore it was out of order to discuss the question whether the Jewish or the Christian or any other Sabbath was the proper one. It was the Christian Sabbath, which was recognized by the community generally, and whose observance the convention was called to promote.

Mr. Lemmon presented a resolution, that the committee be directed to insert the words "the Lord's day," in lieu of the word "Sabbath; whereupon an animated discussion arose, which was arrested by a motion to lay the resolution on the table, and take a recess until 3 o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The session was opened with prayer by Dr. Nott. The resolutions reported by the standing Committee were adopted without dissent. In connection with the resolutions, several gentlemen made remarks upon the civil, moral, and physical benefits of a day of rest, and adduced many facts in proof of their position.

The chairman of the committee then offered a resolution, stating that in a free country like ours the observance of the Sabbath is peculiarly important in order to secure that respect for the laws which is necessary to tranquility.

At this stage of the proceedings, Mr. Richard Lemmon objected to the wording of the resolution. Another debate sprung up, Mr. Magruder, of Virginia, sustaining Mr. Lemmon's views, and the Rev. Justin Edwards, the Rev. Mr. Hammond, of Pennsylvania, and others, opposing them. Dr. Thomas E. Bond, Jr. of Baltimore, called for the question. The call was sustained, the resolution was then adopted, and the convention adjourned until evening.

The evening session was mainly occupied in reading letters from distinguished individuals who were unable to be present; listening to statements by delegates from different sections of the country, as to the manner in which Sunday was kept in those sections; and raising money for the purpose of publishing the proceedings of the Convention in a pamphlet form.

THURSDAY MORNING.

The session was opened by Bishop Wainwright. About twenty resolutions were passed, after having been sustained by speeches from several gentlemen. These resolutions generally have reference to the usefulness of a rest-day; its influence in promoting health and improving society; and the duty of public as well as private citizens to observe it. One resolution calls upon temperance men to regard the Sabbath, because of its influence in promoting temperance; and another endorses the address of the New York State Convention to the directors of railroads.

In the course of the morning, Mr. Lemmon rose to offer a report expressive of his views, and of the reasons for his course on the preceding day. He spoke at some length of his opinions, and was replied to by a Mr. Cross. But as the discussion seemed likely to become an exciting one, several members interfered, and it was arrested.

After the reading of several letters from distinguished individuals, which contained some interesting facts, Mr. Adams, the venerable President, announced that he should not be able to be present again in the convention. A resolution of thanks to him was passed, and the convention adjourned till the afternoon.

AFTERNOON AND EVENING.

During the early part of the afternoon session, letters from associations and individuals in various places were read. A. S. Childs, Esq., urged with much earnestness the necessity of an appeal to the Christian churches in favor of a strict observance of the Lord's day; and his resolution that an address be prepared for that purpose was handed over to the business committee.

A resolution was introduced, expressing regret that Congress had held repeated sessions on Sunday within a few years past, and advising the National Legislature to refrain from this practice in future. This resolution led to a warm discussion, which was continued during the remainder of the afternoon, and throughout the whole evening. Several amendments to the first resolution were proposed, in order, as it would seem, to get round the necessity of rebuking "sin" in so high a place. At a late hour in the evening, a substitute for the resolution was introduced, approving the course of "such members of Congress as have heretofore attempted to prevent desecration of the Lord's Day," and expressing a hope that they may hereafter "be sustained by a majority of their honorable body."

Votes of thanks to several individuals were then passed, and the convention adjourned sine die.

Such was the great National Convention about which much has been said, and for which extensive preparations were made. It was unquestionably a great assemblage of reverends, doctors, and honorables. But we think no one can read its proceedings without noticing two important features of them which must oppose serious obstacles to the highest usefulness of the convention.

The first is, that all investigation of the Scriptural authority for keeping or refusing to keep a Sabbath, together with the question which day, if any, ought to be observed, was studiously avoided. Even when the question was brought up by an invited member of the convention, who was prompted to do so by the unwarrantable phraseology of the resolutions under discussion, instead of being answered, it was unceremoniously laid upon the table. This indicates a tenderness and fear upon that fundamental point, which will forever prevent harmonious and vigorous action. Such a course must fail, because it attempts to heal a hurt slightly, saying "Peace, peace, when there is no peace."

The second is, that the profit and popularity of Sabbath-keeping is made the great reason for urging it. Reference is continually made to this; and facts upon facts are collected, and so interpreted as to prove the policy of resting one day in seven. Thus an impression is left, not only that godliness is gain, but that gain is godliness. There is no attempt to enshrine the day and its duties in the hearts of men, by connecting them with the command and example of the Father and the Judge; this being treated as a secondary consideration. It is easy to foresee the consequences of such a course. Just so soon, and just so often, as men think they can make more by breaking the Sabbath than by keeping it, they will do it. The question becomes one of health or sickness, loss or gain, and it will be decided at different times according as the probabilities change. Though conventions got up and conducted upon such principles may make a show for the time being, we do not believe they will permanently advance the interests of the Sabbath.

REPORT OF N. V. HULL.

New York, Dec, 1, 1844.

I propose to give, through the Recorder, some account of the National Lord's Day Convention, which convened on the 27th ult. at Baltimore, Md. The notice which I propose to give in this communication, however, will be brief, referring to only a few things, except as connected with my own labors.

Owing to circumstances beyond my control, I did not arrive in Baltimore until after the convention had organized and commenced its business. Soon after my arrival, a scene was witnessed which gave me to understand that one of the great objects of my mission must fail. A Mr. Lemmon called up a resolution which he had previously introduced, the object of which was to induce the convention to drop from its resolutions and proceedings the word Sabbath altogether. The convention, misunderstanding him, and supposing he intended to introduce some question foreign to its objects, became very much excited. Cries of "order" were heard from all parts of the house; but as Mr. Lemmon insisted on his right to be heard, the excitement increased, until utter confusion prevailed—some crying out with vehemence, "order, order," and some hissing and giving other polite tokens of dissatisfaction, until finally almost the whole convention rose upon their feet and began to move about. Presently, however, they began to see that they were out of order themselves! On resuming their seats, explanations were made, declaring that it was highly offensive for any person to introduce any thing foreign to the objects of the convention; that the convention had not come together to consider the question whether there was a Sabbath, or which day of the week was the Sabbath, but "to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, or the Christian Sabbath;" and that they hoped no gentleman had come there to make disturbance. Thus I was informed, that to introduce the question "which day was to be kept," would be regarded as out of order and ungentlemanly, and could not be done, without making disturbance. I saw, of course, that all hope of an opportunity to speak to the convention must be abandoned. I then went to the office of the Baltimore Patriot, and caused to be published the following:—

To the Editor of the Baltimore Patriot:

SIR—Having been appointed by a Committee of the Seventh-Day Baptist General Conference a delegate to the "National Lord's Day Convention," now convened in this city, and there being no other opportunity, I desire through your paper to ask them the following questions:

1. Has God appointed more than one day to be the weekly Sabbath?
2. Did God appoint that day to be the weekly Sabbath on which he rested?
3. Did he not rest upon the seventh day of the week?
4. Does the New Testament appoint a new Sabbath, or recognize the one contained in the Fourth Commandment?
5. Is not the seventh day of the week the only God-appointed Sabbath?
6. Is it true, what Dr. Neander states, that the Festival of Sunday was always a human ordinance? If so, had not the Church better return to the ordinance of God, and thereby honor Him who said, "The Sabbath was made for man."

N. V. HULL.

I then, in order to make another effort to bring the matter before the convention, drafted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this convention, the churches of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination ought not to be regarded as Sabbath-breakers, while they religiously observe the seventh day of the week instead of the first."

But on presenting this resolution to one of the members of the committee on resolutions, asking him to present it to the committee, in order that through them it might come before the convention, I was informed that the committee could not present a resolution of that kind, as it would bring up the question of the civil law, which the committee desired to avoid.

Only one thing was then left to be done, and that was, to furnish the convention with a supply of papers and tracts, which was faithfully done; and certain it is, that I never saw tracts more diligently read than were those little messengers of truth. What the result may be is only known to God.

OBSERVATIONS OF A TOURIST—NO. 2.

For the Recorder.

I have been sometimes surprised, on making new acquaintances, to find how erroneously one part of mankind think of their fellows with whom they have no direct acquaintance; and how unjustly they sometimes censure those of whose principles they know nothing but from vague report. This has been particularly so in becoming acquainted with the Seventh-day Baptists. I know too well, that in some quarters they are supposed to be a peculiarly wayward and sectarian people, and so legalized in their doctrinal views as hardly to be evangelical! These things I have found to be as untrue of them as a denomination, as I have ever found them of any other denomination in the United States, or in Europe. No people that I have ever been acquainted with, have a higher relish for evangelical, spiritual, experimental preaching, than the Seventh-day Baptists. I use these terms in their popular meaning; and I am sure there is no denomination of Christians that are more entitled to the appellation of evangelical and experimental Christians, than are the Seventh-day Baptists. So far are they from being peculiarly of a sectarian spirit, that there is no people with whom I have met, more ready to open their pulpits to any well accredited ministers of other denominations, than are they; or to unite with others in all proper acts of worship; or who are more careful not to judge the spiritual standing, in the sight of God, of all those who differ from them on important Bible truths. So far are they from making "a God of the Sabbath," as a fellow-traveler lately censoriously said, or their making it the principal theme of ministrations, I am sure I have known no denomination less forward to give a prominence to their peculiar distinction, than are they. It may appear otherwise to some, who have occasional intercourse with them, because the observation of the seventh day is the principal thing in which they differ from other people; so that if they have any discussion of religious principles, it is more likely to turn upon that point than any other. The seventh-day people feel this; and if I am not mistaken, it has had its influence in deterring them from giving that prominence to the subject of the Sabbath's claims, in their public ministrations, which its importance requires. I have been informed, that churches with a settled pastor, have not heard a single sermon on the claims of the Sabbath for a number of years together! If the same has been the case in family instruction, these things may account in part for many of their young people leaving them to keep the first-day. If the first-day and the seventh-day observance are only presented before them in the prepossesions of neighbors, and the young are left to form their principles by the influence of society around them, it is easy to see that they are likely to be drawn to the popular side of the question, and to suppose that cannot be very important which neither minister nor parent takes any particular labor to inculcate as the command of the ever-living God, however much minister and parent may be prepossessed in its favor.

In these things, it appears to me, many of the Seventh-day Baptists are at fault; they are not enough aggressive. They are ready to defend themselves when their sentiments are attacked, but they have seldom attempted to propagate their sentiments where they have not already had a beginning by colonization. So long as this is the case, they must needs make slow progress. I am aware, that there is some improvement in this matter of late; but there needs to be a great increase of earnestness and vigor before the proper zeal for these things can be generally maintained. There is too much wincing when friends and neighbors are pinched by some others applying the law of God to their consciences, and too great a want of confidence in the power of God's truth to bring the disobedient to the wisdom of the just.

My earnest desire and prayer is, that we may all seek with more zeal, fidelity, and faith, the promotion of the cause of God's holy Sabbath. Mankind are not all invincible to the truth; nor are they often brought out of a long-cherished error by a single effort. They must have line upon line, line upon line; precept upon precept, precept upon precept. No doubt, when this is done, opponents will increase their reproaches; but such is ever the case where truth is brought into conflict with error. Pedobaptists charge Baptists with making too much of baptism—"a saving ordinance!" say their opponents. If they had listened to these things, they had never made the progress they have; but they said, "Wisdom is justified of her children," and went on preaching the truth. The Sabbatarians make too much of the Sabbath, say Sunday-keepers; they think they are going to be saved by keeping the seventh day! If we make it our principal business to show them we are evangelical, their end is answered, and the cause of the Sabbath is impeded. But if we go forward in God's strength, and proclaim his truth, whether men will hear or forbear, the Lord will take care of our reputation, and the cause of the Sabbath will be onward.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

A letter has been received from RICHARD C. BOND, who is traveling and preaching on the Virginia Station, giving some additional encouragement to the friends of the mission to persevere in their noble and pious enterprise. His congregations are increasing, and numbers are inquiring to know the truth.

AZOR ESTEE has commenced his winter tour, as directed by the Executive Board of the Missionary Association. He has labored about two weeks in the villages along the Hudson river between Troy and New York, distributing publications and laboring to direct the minds of the people to the subject of the Sabbath. He is now in this city, but will immediately pursue his journey through the State of New Jersey into Pennsylvania. He will probably visit our churches in Virginia before he returns; but his labors will be principally directed to the circulation of intelligence upon the subject of the Sabbath.

We hope the churches will be induced, in view of the good that has been done, to give us their assistance in this noble work.

New York, Dec. 3.

W. B. GILLETT, Rec. Sec.

P. S. Tracts for R. C. Bond have been forwarded by Azor Estee.

QUERY.—At the recent Lord's day Convention, several hours were spent in discussing a resolution condemnatory of the course of Congress in holding sessions on Sunday. The resolution was finally rejected, to all intents and purposes, though nominally substituted by another. The question naturally arises, why this unwillingness to condemn in Congressmen that which is denounced as a flagrant sin in the common people? Was it from a fear to incur the displeasure of men in high places? Or was it from a hesitancy about asserting that it is a sin to attend to secular business on Sunday?

REV. CHARLES T. TORREY.—The trial of this gentleman commenced before the Baltimore City Court on Friday last. There were three separate indictments against him for enticing and aiding three slaves to escape from that city. He was brought into Court in irons, in the presence of his wife and her father, and the scene is said to have been most affecting. Nathaniel Cox and Reverdy Johnson, were his counsel—the latter of whom made an eloquent plea on his behalf, without fee or reward. On Monday the jury brought in a verdict of guilty. The counsel then moved an arrest of judgment, and for a new trial; but it is feared the prisoner will not escape a long term in the penitentiary.

THE TRUE WESLEYAN.—This spirited weekly, which was formerly published in Boston by Mr. Scott, has lately become the property of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection, has been removed to New York, placed under the editorial care of Luther Lee, and is to be issued from No. 5 Spruce street, where a Wesleyan Methodist Book Concern has been established.

JEWISH CHRONICLE.—The last number of this monthly periodical, published by the American Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews, comes to us enlarged by the addition of eight pages. It now contains 32 octavo pages, which are filled with a variety of interesting matter concerning the Jews.

The Session of Congress has fairly commenced, and we shall endeavor to furnish our readers with an account of whatever is done of general interest. Our account will be made up on Wednesday of each week, and will be a faithful compilation from the best daily papers.

DAY OF FASTING AND PRAYER.

It will be remembered, that at the last meeting of the General Conference, a day of fasting and prayer was recommended, to be held on the first day of the week after the first Sabbath in January, being the 5th day of the month. It is hoped that the churches will make timely arrangements for a general and profitable observance of the day. The following are the resolutions of the Conference:—

Resolved, That inasmuch as the first day of November, 1843, was observed, in accordance with the recommendation of this General Conference, as a day of humiliation before God, and earnest entreaty to Him to arise and plead for his holy Sabbath, since which time a deeper and wider-spread interest upon the subject has sprung up, than has ever been before known in this country; therefore, Resolved, That the 1st first day of the week in January next, be observed as a day of fasting, devout acknowledgment for blessings bestowed, and earnest prayer that God would continue to plead for his holy Sabbath, and also prepare us by his Holy Spirit for the labor thus devolved upon us.

Resolved, That we invite all who love the Sabbath, and desire its better observance, to unite with us in presenting its interests at the throne of grace.

General Intelligence.

ORGANIZATION OF CONGRESS.

House of Representatives.—Precisely at 12 o'clock on Monday, Dec. 2, Speaker Jones took the chair, and called the House to order. A quorum was present; 175 members answering to their names. A message was received from the Senate informing the House that the Senate was organized, and a joint committee was appointed to inform the President that Congress was in session. Mr. Holmes of S. C. offered a resolution that the House proceed to the election of a chaplain; whereupon Mr. Pettit of Indiana, offered an amendment that said chaplain be paid by subscription of the members, and not by the government. He addressed the House for thirty minutes in support of his amendment. The vote on the amendment was lost; ayes 20, nays 152.

John Quincy Adams gave notice that he would to-morrow introduce a resolution to rescind the 25th rule (concerning petitions on slavery.) Several notices of intention to introduce bills were then given, and the House adjourned until 12 o'clock on Tuesday.

Senate.—The Senate assembled at 12 o'clock, Hon. W. P. Mangum in the chair, and 26 members present. After passing the usual resolutions, the Senate adjourned.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

A government express left Washington at 12 o'clock on Tuesday, and brought the Message to this city at 10 o'clock of the same evening. The document is so lengthy, that we have thought best to make the following abstract of it, and only give entire those portions in which the deepest interest will be felt.

The Message commences with an allusion to the causes for gratitude in view of our abundant blessings, and especially in view of the quiet manner in which the late election was conducted. This is treated of at length, as an evidence of the safety and stability of our government.

Foreign Relations.

There has been no material change in our foreign relations since my last Annual Message to Congress. With all the powers of Europe we continue on the most friendly terms. Indeed, it affords me much satisfaction to state, that at no former period has the peace of that enlightened and important quarter of the globe ever been, apparently, more firmly established. The conviction that peace is the true policy of nations would seem to be growing and becoming deeper amongst the enlightened every where; and there is no people who have a stronger interest in cherishing the sentiments, and adopting the means of preserving and giving it permanence, than those of the United States. * * *

Mexico and Texas.

In my last Annual Message I felt it to be my duty to make known to Congress, in terms both plain and emphatic, my opinion in regard to the war which has so long existed between Mexico and Texas; which, since the battle of San Jacinto, has consisted altogether of predatory incursions, attended by circumstances revolting to humanity. I repeat now, what I then said, that, after eight years of feeble and ineffectual efforts to recover Texas, it was time that the war should have ceased. The United States had a direct interest in the question.

The contiguity of the two Nations to our Territory was but too well calculated to involve our peace. Unjust suspicions were engendered in the mind of one or the other of the belligerents against us; and, as a necessary consequence, American interests were made to suffer, and our peace became daily endangered. In addition to which, it must have been obvious to all that the exhaustion produced by the war, subjected both Mexico and Texas to the interference of other powers; which, without the interposition of this Government, might eventuate in the most serious injury to the United States. This Government, from time to time, exerted its friendly offices to bring about a termination of the hostilities upon terms honorable alike to both the belligerents. Its efforts in this behalf proved unavailing. Mexico seemed, almost without an object, to persevere in the war, and no other alternative was left to the Executive but to take advantage of the well-known dispositions of Texas, and to invite her to enter into a treaty for annexing her territory to that of the United States.

Since your last session, Mexico has threatened to renew the war, and has either made, or proposes to make formidable preparations for invading Texas. She has issued decrees and proclamations, preparatory to the commencement of hostilities, full of threats revolting to humanity; and which, if carried into effect, would arouse the attention of all Christendom. This new demonstration of feeling, there is too much reason to believe, has been produced in consequence of the negotiation of the late treaty of annexation with Texas. The Executive, therefore, could not be indifferent to such proceedings; and it felt it to be due, as well to itself, as to the honor of the country, that a strong representation should be made to the Mexican Government upon the subject. This was accordingly done; as will be seen by the copy of the accompanying despatch from the Secretary of State to the United States Envoy at Mexico. Mexico has no right to jeopard the peace of the world, by urging any longer, a useless and fruitless contest. Such a condition of things would not be tolerated on the European continent. Why should it be on this? A war of desolation, such as is now threatened by Mexico, cannot be waged without involving our peace and tranquility.

It is idle to believe that such a war could be looked upon with indifference by our own citizens, inhabiting adjoining States; and our neutrality would be violated, in despite of all the efforts on the part of the Government to prevent it. The country is settled by emigrants from the United States, under invitations held out to them by Spain and Mexico. Those emigrants have left behind them friends and relatives who would not fail to sympathise with them in their difficulties, and who would be led by those sympathies to participate in their struggles, however energetic the action of the Government to prevent it. Nor would the numerous and formidable bands of Indians, the most warlike to be found in any land, which occupy the extensive regions contiguous to the States of Arkansas and Missouri, and who are in possession of large tracts of country within the limits of Texas, be likely to remain passive. The inclinations of those numerous tribes lead them invariably to war whenever pretexts exist.

Mexico had no just ground of displeasure against this Government or People for negotiating the Treaty. What interests of hers was affected by the Treaty? She was despoiled of nothing, since Texas was for ever lost to her. The independence of Texas was recognized by several of the leading powers of the earth. She was free to treat—free to adopt her own line of policy—free to take the course which she believed was best calculated to secure her happiness. Her Government and People decided on annexation to the United States; and the Executive saw, in the acquisition of such a territory, the means of advancing their permanent happiness and glory. What principle of good faith then was violated? What rule of political morals trampled under foot? So far as Mexico herself was concerned, the measure should have been regarded by her as highly beneficial. Her inability to conquer Texas had been exhibited, I repeat, by eight—now nine—years of fruitless and ruinous contest. In the mean time, Texas has been growing in population and resources. Emigration has flowed into her territory, from all parts of the world, in a current which continues to increase in strength. Mexico requires a permanent boundary between that young Republic and herself. Texas, at no distant day, if she continues separate and detached from the United States, will inevitably seek to consolidate her strength by adding to her domain the contiguous provinces of Mexico.

The spirit of revolt from the control of the Central Government has, heretofore, manifested itself in some of those provinces; and it is fair to infer that they would be inclined to take the first favorable opportunity to proclaim their independence, and to form close alliances with Texas. The war would thus be endless; or, if cessation of hostilities should occur, they would only endure for a season. The interests of Mexico, therefore, could in nothing be better consulted than in a peace with her neighbors, which would result in the establishment of a permanent boundary. Upon the ratification of the Treaty, the Executive was prepared to treat with her on the most liberal basis. Hence the boundaries of Texas were left undefined by the Treaty. The Executive proposed to settle these upon terms that all the world should have pronounced just and reasonable. No negotiation upon that point could have been undertaken between the United States and Mexico, in advance of the ratification of the Treaty.

We should have had no right—no power—no authority, to have conducted such a negotiation;—and to have undertaken it, would have been an assumption equally revolting to the pride of Mexico and Texas, and subjecting us to the charge of arrogance; while to have proposed, in advance of annexation, to satisfy Mexico for any contingent interest she might have in Texas, would have been to have treated Texas, not as an independent power, but as a mere dependency of Mexico. This assumption could not have been acted on by the Executive, without setting at defiance your own solemn declaration that that Republic was an independent State. Mexico had, it is true, threatened war against the United States, in the event the Treaty of Annexation was ratified. The Executive could not permit itself to be influenced by this threat. It represented, in this, the spirit of our people, who are ready to sacrifice much for peace, but nothing to intimidation.

A war, under any circumstances, is greatly to be deplored, and the United States is the last nation to desire it; but if, as the condition of peace, it be required of us to forego the unquestionable right of treating with an independent power, of our own Continent, upon matters highly interesting to both, and that upon a naked and unsustained pretension of claim by a third power, to control the free-will of the power with whom we treat—devoted as we may be to peace, and anxious to cultivate friendly relations with the whole world, the Executive does not hesitate to say that the People of the United States would be ready to brave all consequences, sooner than submit to such condition! But no apprehension of war was entertained by the Executive; and I must express frankly the opinion that, had the Treaty been ratified by the Senate, it would have been followed by a prompt settlement, to the entire satisfaction of Mexico, of every matter of difference between the two countries. Seeing then that new preparations for a hostile invasion of Texas were about to be adopted by Mexico, and that these were brought about because Texas had adopted the suggestions of the Executive upon the subject of Annexation, it could not passively have folded its arms and permitted a war, that threatened to be accompanied by every act that could mark a barbarous age, to be waged against her, because she had done so.

Other considerations of a controlling character influenced the course of the Executive. The Treaty which had thus been negociated, had failed to receive the ratification of the Senate. One of the chief objections which was urged against it was found to consist in the fact, that the question of Annexation had not been submitted to the ordeal of public opinion in the United States. However untenable such an objection was esteemed to be, in view of the unquestionable power of the Executive to negociate the Treaty, and the great and lastiag interests involved in the question, I felt it to be my duty to submit the whole subject to Congress as the best expounders of popular sentiment. No definitive action having been taken on the subject by Congress, the question referred itself directly to the decision of the States and the People. The great popular election which has just terminated, afforded the best opportunity of ascertaining the will of the States and the People upon it.

Pending that issue, it became the imperative duty of the Executive to inform Mexico that the question of annexation was still before the American People, and that until their decision was pronounced, any serious invasion of Texas would be regarded as an attempt to forestall their judgment, and could not be looked upon with indifference. I am most happy to inform you, that no such invasion has taken place; and I trust that whatever your action may be upon it, Mexico will see the importance of deciding the matter by a resort to peaceful expedients, in preference to those of arms. The decision of the People and the States, on this great and interesting subject, has been decisively manifested. The question of annexation has been presented nakedly to their consideration. By the treaty itself, all collateral and incidental issues, which were calculated to divide and distract the public councils, were carefully avoided. These were left to the wisdom of the future to determine. It presented, I repeat, the isolated question of annexation; and in that form it has been submitted to the ordeal of public sentiment.

A controlling majority of the People, and a large majority of the States, have declared in favor of immediate annexation. Instructions have thus come up to both branches of Congress, from their respective constituents, in terms the most emphatic. It is the will of both the People and the States, that Texas shall be annexed to the Union promptly and immediately. It may be hoped that, in carrying into execution the public will thus declared, all collateral issues may be avoided. Future Legislatures can best decide as to the number of States which should be formed out of the territory, when the time has arrived, for deciding that question. So with all others. By the treaty, the United States assumed the payment of the debts of Texas, to an amount not exceeding $10,000,000; to be paid, with the exception of a sum falling short of $40,000, exclusively out of the proceeds of the sales of her public lands. We could not, with honor, take the lands, without assuming the full payment of all incumbrance upon them.

Nothing has occurred since our last session, to induce a doubt that the disposition of Texas remain unaltered. No intimation of an altered determination, on the part of her Government and People, has been furnished to the Executive. She still desires to throw herself under the protection of our laws, and to partake of the blessings of our federative system; while every American interest would seem to require it. The extension of our coast-wise and foreign trade, to an amount almost incalculable—the enlargement of the market for manufactures—a constantly growing market for our agricultural productions—safety to our frontiers, and aditional strength and ability to the Union—these are the results which would rapidly develop themselves, upon the consummation of the measure of annexation. In such event, I will not doubt but that Mexico would find her true interest to consist in meeting the advances of this Government in a spirit of amity.

Nor do I apprehend any serious complaint from any other quarter; no sufficient ground exists for such complaint. We should interfere in no respect with the rights of any other nation. There cannot be gathered from the act, any design on our part to do so with their possessions on this Continent. We have interposed no impediments in the way of such acquisitions of territory, large and extensive as many of them are, as the leading Powers of Europe have made, from time to time, in every part of this world. We seek no conquest made by war. No intrigue will have been resorted to, or acts of diplomacy essayed to accomplish the annexation of Texas. Free and independent herself, she seeks to be received into our Union. It is a question for our own decision, whether she shall be received or not.

The two Governments having already agreed, through their respective organs, on the terms of Annexation, I would recommend their adoption by Congress in the form of a joint resolution or act, to be perfected and made binding on the two countries, when adopted in a like manner by the Government of Texas.

Condition of the Treasury.

The greatly improved condition of the Treasury affords a subject for general congratulation. The paralysis which had fallen on trade and commerce and which subjected the Government to the necessity of resorting to loans, and the issue of Treasury Notes, to a large amount, has passed away; and, after the payment of upwards of $7,000,000, on account of the interest, and in redemption of more than $5,000,000 of public debt, which falls due on the first of January next, and setting apart upwards of $2,000,000 for the payment of outstanding Treasury Notes, and meeting an instalment of the debts of the corporate cities of the District of Columbia—an estimated surplus of upwards of $7,000,000, over and above the existing appropriations, will remain in the Treasury at the close of the fiscal year. * * *

In regard to the condition of the Army and Navy, the Message says but little, referring to the reports of the Secretaries of War and the Navy for information on those topics. It however strongly urges the policy of authorizing the establishment of a line of steamships to ply regularly between this country and foreign ports, for the transportation of mails, and for use as naval vessels in case of emergency.

Post Office Department.

In referring you to the accompanying report of the Postmaster General, it affords me continued cause of gratification to be able to advert to the fact, that the affairs of the Department, for the last four years, have been so conducted as, from its unaided resources, to meet its large expenditures. On my coming into office, a debt of nearly $500,000 existed against the Department, which Congress discharged by an appropriation from the Treasury. The Department, on the 4th of March next, will be found, under the management of its present efficient head, free of debt or embarrassment, which could only have been done by the observance and practice of the greatest vigilance and economy. The laws have contemplated, throughout, that the Department should be self-sustained; but it may become necessary, with the wisest regard to the public interests, to introduce amendments and alterations in the system. There is a strong desire manifested in many quarters, so to alter the tariff of letter postage as to reduce the amount of tax at present imposed.

Should such a measure be carried into effect, to the full extent desired, it cannot well be doubted but that, for the first years of its operation, a diminished revenue would be collected, the supply of which would necessarily constitute a charge upon the Treasury. Whether such a result would be desirable, it will be for Congress, in its wisdom, to determine. It may in general be asserted, that radical alterations in any system should rather be brought about gradually than by sudden changes; and by pursuing this prudent policy in the reduction of letter postage, the Department might still sustain itself through the revenue which would accrue by the increase of letters. The state and condition of the public Treasury has, heretofore, been such as to have precluded the recommendation of any material change. The difficulties upon this head have, however, ceased, and a larger discretion is now left to the Government. * * *

In conclusion, the Message speaks in high terms of the faithfulness of the Government officers; of the present condition of the commercial, manufacturing, and financial interests of the country; and of the President's anticipations on leaving to others "the noble and pleasing task of sustaining the national prosperity."

The papers from Buffalo, Utica, Albany, Boston, Portland, Me., Philadelphia, Alexandria, D. C., and every direction, speak of the coldness of the weather and the wintery aspect of things.

Anti-Rent.—The Schenectada Cabinet says that on Friday afternoon, Gen. Jacob Livingston, of Cherry Valley, while on his way home from his mills in Middleburgh, and when near Gridley's gate, was intercepted by five or six men disguised in Indian dresses, who seized his horses and ordered him to stop. He declined, and requested them to clear the road and allow him to pass. They refused, and he ordered his driver to put whip to his horses and proceed, at the same time drawing a pistol and firing it at one of the men, the top of whose head was grazed by the ball.

Mr. L. was so hotly pursued as to be obliged to take refuge in the house of Judge Mattice, near the gate, whence he despatched a messenger to the Sheriff of the county, who in due time made his appearance with a posse, and succeeded in apprehending two of the "Indians," one of whom is safely lodged in jail, and the other being badly injured, was left in keeping at Middleburgh. The disguised persons are said to be residents of Bern, Albany Co.

Mexico.—The Houston Telegraph of the 6th Nov. contains the folowing:—"A gentleman has just arrived in this city from the West, who states that a report has been brought to San Antonio, that all Northern Mexico along the Rio Grande, is now in a state of revolt against the Dictator. The report, as brought in by a Mexican Major, who represents himself as having deserted from Gen. Woll's Army, is, that Arista is now marching for the city of Mexico with an army of 17,000—that he is already beyond the mountains, and that his numbers are daily and rapidly increasing by fresh recruits from all the surrounding country. It is stated that the spirit of revolution is universal and overwhelming. Carabajal is well acquainted with the deserting Major, and pledges his life on the truth of his statement.

Important Case Decided.—In my last I informed you of the pending of a suit in this county for the recovery, or to use the language of the plaintiff's lawyer, "the recapture" of 60 negroes, manumitted in this State seventeen years ago. I have now the pleasure to inform you that justice has triumphed, and the 28 inmates of the county jail are set free. The disclosures made upon this trial, of the long and secret preparations made, of the promises, threats, and money spent, when fully reported, will altogether exhibit one of the most bold and daring schemes to triumph over law and justice, through professed legal means, upon record.

He says: "It is larger than the common field strawberry, very hardy, and yields a great quantity of fruit, producing in succession three or four weeks. When ripe, it is of a yellowish white, contrasting beautifully with the red strawberry. It has a fine flavor, and when picked cleaves from the hull."

The Governor of New York has issued his proclamation, offering a reward of five hundred dollars for the apprehension of certain men disguised as Indians, who recently waylaid a deputy sheriff, in the town of Sandlake, while on his way to summon witnesses before the grand jury of Rensselaer county, took his papers from him by violence, and threatned him with personal injury.

A French statistical work states that the inclination of crime is at its maximum in men about the age of 25—in women five years later, and the greatest physical strength of man is developed between the age of 25 and 30, and the greatest mental powers between the age of 45 and 50; and that gaming is the principal cause of suicide among males, and disappointments in love affairs among females.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. Kenyon, as Principal, and Miss Caroline B. Maxson, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

Tuition, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

THE UNMOURNED.

No tear-drop fell from that mother's eye
When the child of her bosom died,
There waked no sound of a sister's sigh
That lonely bier beside;
And the father's brow was stern,
And the brothers turned away,
Their hearts were sad, but they could not mourn
For her who then from their fireside torn,
In her graveclothes near them lay.

She had shared their childish joys,
She had led the youthful band,
When those gentle girls, and fair-haired boys,
To their sports went hand in hand;
And her heart was glad and wild,
And her cheek was passing fair,
She had grown in their midst a joyous child,
And the stranger that gazed on her features, smiled,
For beauty, and truth were there.

They had loved her long, and well,
They had watched her with joy and pride,
And sweetly the notes from her young lips fell,
On the hearts at that blest fireside.
But now, ere the freshened bloom,
Of her girlish years had fled,
Mid the clods of the valley she asked for room,
And they bore her away from her lonely home,
To rest with the unmourned dead.

Why was that love so changed?
How had those hearts been turned?
Why from that kindred band estranged,
Thus did she die unmourned?
What were those lines of care
That her gentle brow o'ertraced?
What was the worm that had eaten there—
Whose path was marked on her features fair,
Till their beauty was half effaced?

The sorrow of friends that part—
The deep and relentless woe—
The harrowing pang of the bursting heart—
They had felt them long ago.
Aye, deeper had been their pain
Than the hand of death bestows—
She had laid on their bosoms a festering chain,
And they could not call her back again,
Or mourn o'er her young life's close.

Long since to that household band,
He came, with his withering breath,
And she had bowed to the Spoiler's hand,
But that Spoiler was not Death.
With a blight, to her heart he crept,
And her brow was wreathed with shame;
For her, there had many a tear been wept,
Ere her pulse was stilled, or her spirit slept—
They were shed o'er her blighted name.

HARRIET.

THE GRAVE IN THE WILDERNESS.

The following narrative, strange as it may seem to the reader, is strictly true. The circumstances were related to a gentleman of high standing in the community, by the benevolent friend at whose house William first stopped in Pennsylvania, and they were afterward corroborated by one who had just returned from Canada, where he had met with William, who was in a respectable business there, and had received the account from his own lips. They prove that "truth is sometimes stranger than fiction." As a proof likewise of love stronger than death, which many waters cannot quench, nor floods drown, they may interest your readers.

William was a slave, belonging to the plantation of the Hon. Wm. C. of South Carolina. He was a mulatto of fine appearance and uncommon intelligence, and as the coachman of his master enjoyed many privileges denied to others of his class; he had formed an attachment for a young Quadroon, who was the personal attendant of her mistress, and who had profited to the utmost by the few opportunities afforded her, so that in mind and manners she was far superior to many who looked down upon her as a slave, with contempt. Her personal appearance was likewise, uncommonly attractive, and poor William soon found that though his attachment was warmly returned, and she had become his wife according to the simple form recognised among slaves, his claims to the chosen of his heart were not likely to be undisputed. A gentleman on a visit to his master saw the beautiful Quadroon, took a fancy to her, and by the payment of a large sum of money became her legal owner. True, she was known to be the wife of William, who was devotedly attached to her, and it was known too that she was purchased as the intended paramour of her master, who was a married man, but William might soon console himself with another, and the feelings of the wretched girl were not once taken into the account. Indeed as a slave, what right had she to feelings on the subject? So she was torn away from home and husband, and friends, and carried by her new owner to Alabama. William locked up his sense of the wrong done him in his own bosom, and though his merry laugh was hushed, and his brow was always clouded, he attended to his duties with the same faithfulness and precision as before. But his sleeping and waking thoughts were always full of one image—that of his beloved Lucy, separated from him forever, and compelled to forget, in the arms of a stranger, the husband who would gladly have died to save her from this dreadful fate. Could he not even now, rescue her? The very thought was rapture, but how was it to be accomplished? Alabama seemed to him almost in another world, and the fearful risks he ran in attempting to escape, were vividly present to his mind. Still the idea haunted him continually, and while his soul was thus agitated, an unexpected opportunity was presented to carry his plan into execution. His master was away from home, for the winter, and a friend of his mistress who had been long promising her a visit, wrote to request that the carriage might be sent for her, as she was now in readiness to fulfil her engagement. This lady resided two hundred miles from the plantation of Mr. C. in the interior of the State, and thither William was despatched with the carriage and horses to bring the expected visiter. He was obliged to wait a few days for the lady, and while there, among strangers, and with nothing but thought to occupy him, he first formed the definite determination to escape, and make one effort to become a free man. He was able in some degree to count the cost, and knew that if he failed, a fate worse than death awaited him; but the love of liberty was strong within him, and his resolution was taken. But his wife—should he escape and leave her behind, or should he seek the far South, and endeavor to find her, and make her the companion of his flight? A moment he hesitated, for the star of freedom pointed to the north, and he knew not in what part of the state to seek his Lucy, but love triumphed, and the day before he was to have started for home, he fled, leaving no trace behind, by which his track might be discovered. It was of course supposed that he had gone to the north, and thus pursuit was avoided by him, in his perilous flight. After some weeks wandering, he reached Alabama, and guided by that Providence which watches over the friendless, he came at last to the neighborhood in which the plantation of Lucy's master was situated. Having made acquaintance with a slave on the plantation, he contrived to send word to Lucy that he was near, and to encourage a meeting. And what a meeting was that! His hunger and wretchedness, his torn and bleeding feet, his danger, his sufferings all were forgotten as he clasped that beloved and long lost wife to his heart, and heard her whispered words of tenderness and piety. But alas—she was not free, and her absence might be noticed, and thus bring ruin on them both. She must leave him, but before they separated, a plan was agreed on by which they might daily meet, and he had told her his wild hopes and projects, to which she listened with a smile of utter incredulity. It was impossible, she said, for them to travel such an immense distance without discovery, and to one who had been delicately brought up, the perils and sufferings of such a flight, at such a season were appalling. He plead his cause with all the eloquence of love, and the assurance that he must go without her if she refused, wrung her heart. When she next visited William, her mind was made up, to accompany him, feeling as she said, that she had rather suffer a thousand deaths with him, than to be again separated, and left in the power of her present master. In one week, she had made all needed preparations for them both, and together they started for the land of liberty, guided only by that "north star," which has led so many pilgrims to hope and happiness. I will not dwell on the detail of their sufferings and privations during the sad and weary months which were occupied in traversing the swamps and forests of the southern States. All night the poor fugitives travelled, and during the day, faint and toil worn, they lay concealed in the woods, hardly daring to breathe, lest their hiding place should be discovered. The same kind care which sent food to Elijah by the agency of ravens, supplied them by means almost equally miraculous; and cold and hunger were unheeded while they shared it together. Often, from their entire ignorance of the geography of the States through which they passed, they took a wrong direction, and after a long and fatiguing circuit found themselves at the point from which they started. Often too, with alarm and horror indescribable, they heard the deep baying of hounds in pursuit of some fugitives like themselves, and trembled, lest at the next moment they might dash in on their retreat, and betray them to their inhuman pursuers. At one time, they came to a large and deep river, over which they could find no bridge, and not daring to avail themselves of the ferry in the immediate neighborhood, they went for a long distance up and down the stream, until just at day-break, they resolved to make the desperate attempt to swim across, and if they perished, to die together. To do this, they were obliged to leave most of their few articles of food and clothing they had thus far carried, and trust Providence for the supply of their future wants. By incredible exertions William succeeded in holding up the frightened and fainting Lucy, while he made his own way across the river; but when he reached the bank, he had scarcely strength to throw himself and his almost insensible wife upon it. For some hours they lay there, utterly incapable of moving, and so completely exhausted in mind and body, that the fear of discovery ceased to operate as a stimulus to farther exertion. When at length the benumbing influence of cold, fatigue and hunger had in some measure past away, they found that the little wallet, which contained all their remaining provisions, was lost, leaving them totally destitute of food, or a change of raiment. It was a moment of sore trial, but even then, they found consolation in the consciousness of strong mental affection, and the certainty that nothing but death could part them, for William was resolved, if retaken, to yield his liberty only with his life.

From that day, the privations and sufferings of the fugitives were increased ten fold; and poor Lucy, who bore them all with heroic fortitude, and unshaken courage, was evidently drooping. She made no complaint, and exerted herself even more than before; but a constant fever wasted her strength, and a racking cough told too plainly that her days were numbered. For some weeks they journeyed on, while her emaciated form was frequently borne in the arms of her poor husband, until from sorrow and fatigue, he was compelled to drop the precious burthen, and throw himself on the ground utterly exhausted. Lucy was sensible that she was dying, and her only remaining wish was, to reach a free State, that her last breath might be drawn beneath a free sky, and with the blessed breeze of freedom fanning her fevered brow. For this, she bore up, with a courage and energy almost superhuman, but it was not so to be. They had entered Maryland, and were exulting in the prospect of soon reaching Pennsylvania, when her strength failed, and she became convinced that her last hour was rapidly approaching. They were in the midst of an extensive forest, far from the habitations of man, and this, which under other circumstauces, would have aggravated their distress, was now the only solace of their misery. But who can describe, or conceive, the agony of the heart-broken husband, as he gazed on the faded form of the wife of his bosom, the companion of his sufferings and toils, the being who was literally all the world to him, and without whom even paradise would be a desert. Pale, emaciated, but still lovely, with both her attenuated hands fondly clasping his, and her large dark eyes fixed on him with the tender, confiding expression of infancy, she lay like a bruised reed in his arms, calmly awaiting the dread summons which was to leave him alone, without one ray of hope or comfort from the future. Alas! he had not then learned to seek consolation whence alone it can be derived. The blessed book which brings life and immortality to light, was to him a sealed volume, and no one had ever guided his feet to that compassionate Saviour who wept with Mary and Martha over the tomb of Lazarus. Who can wonder then, that his heart grew sick, and his brain turned round, in that dark hour, while images of the past came thronging up before his mind, as if to mock his anguish. He remembered the childhood of his Lucy; the early love which made even slavery seem less bitter, and the few short months of wedded bliss, which had once been his own. Then came the memory of deep and bitter wrong—of avarice and lust, stepping in between those whom God had joined together, and crushing human hearts with the relentless grasp of despotic power. He thought too of the months of toil and suffering which had followed their joyful reunion, and of the patience and fortitude, and love which had sustained the partner of his flight, and made her voice to him as the voice of an angel. Without one murmuring or reproachful word, she had endured all the hardships of their lot, encouraging and cheering him, by the buoyant hopefulness of her nature, in his moments of deepest depression. And now this cherished object of his love and care was dying—dying just as the goal was in sight, and they were about to enter that land of freedom, for which she had so pined, and which even in dreams was always before her eyes. How valueless then, seemed to him the liberty which she could not partake! How vain all the sacrifices he had made to secure it! While his heart was thus wrung with anguish, the sufferer revived, and after thanking him for the love and kindness which had been the blessing of her life, she entreated him to make no delay after her death, but to hasten his flight, lest even then the pursuer might be on his track, and the cup of freedom be dashed from his lips ere he had tasted its sweetness. True to her unselfish, and affectionate nature to the last, her latest breath was spent in comforting the poor mourner, who sat stupified with grief, long after the spirit had fled, holding the lifeless body in his arms, and gazing on it with a look in which every emotion of the soul seemed concentrated.

> "There was darkness all within his heart,
> And madness in his brain,"

During that long, long night, in which he was sensible only of one overpowering, absorbing feeling of hopeless misery. But with the morning light, came calmer thoughts, and as he looked on the marble features of the dead, from which all traces of sorrow and suffering had vanished, he could almost rejoice that her pilgrimage was over, and she had found the rest of the grave.

The day following the death of Lucy, was spent by the poor fugitive, on the spot where she had breathed her last, and where her remains were still lying in the fixed repose of the sleep that knows no waking. While he could still gaze on the lifeless form of his wife, William did not feel himself utterly bereaved, but he remembered her parting injunction not to delay his flight, and knew that one solemn duty remained to be performed, before he took his departure. He must bury his dead out of his sight, but how was this to be done under his circumstances? There was but one way—and with an aching heart, poor William scooped out the earth with his hands, on a side hill, to a depth which would render her resting place secure, and then prepared to deposit his sole earthly treasure there, to slumber till the heavens be no more. Once and again his resolution failed, and he turned away from the open grave, unable to commit the precious remains, without a shroud or coffin, to its cold embrace. At last, with the strongest effort of which human nature is capable, he lowered the body into the grave, and hastily covering it, ran from the spot without once looking behind him. He had gone but a short distance, when it seemed impossible to proceed one step farther, and an impulse which he could not resist, drew him once more to that hill side where his Lucy was sleeping. With maniac eagerness he tore away the earth that covered her, and almost felt, as he gazed upon the body, as if his wife were giv[illegible] back to him again. For three days and nights, the poor fellow lingered about that grave, making several fruitless attempts to quit it, till at last, feeling that he must soon die without food or shelter, he was impelled by the natural instinct of self preservation to hasten his northern flight. He tore himself from the spot which contained all that he loved on earth, without daring to trust himself with a single look. A few days travel brought him to Pennsylvania, and the first house he entered was that of a benevolent Quaker, who accosted him kindly, and bade him welcome to his roof. Poor William was toil-worn, and faint and sorrowful—still had he met with refusal, his indomitable resolution would have borne him from the door. But the voice of kindness, so long unheard from man, and the feeling of security so long unknown, were too much for his shattered and feeble frame. He fainted instantly, and fell to the floor like one dead. The worthy family into which he had been providentially led, fed, and warmed, and cheered, the fugitive, and had the satisfaction of seeing him in a few days able to express his sense of their kindness, and to give a narrative of his thrilling adventures. When able to leave, he was furnished with all necessary advice and assistance for the safe prosecution of his journey. He is now in the British dominions, established in a good business, and respected by all who know him, as an upright and intelligent man. But it is manifest to the casual observer that he has been a man of sorrow, and those who have heard his sad story, well know, that whatever objects may claim a passing interest, his heart is buried with his Lucy, in that grave in the wilderness, where she sleeps in the dark and distant forest of eastern Maryland. MISTAKES IN FAMILY GOVERNMENT.

It is vastly easier to find fault with other people's family government, than it is to have a perfect system of your own. Yet this is no reason why we should not speak of their errors, and avoid them, and mend our own as we find them out. This is the way to improve.

We have given up scolding. It has neither reason, religion, common sense, or experience to commend it. While there are reasons many and mighty to justify its total and immediate abolition. It sours the temper of the children; so that one thorough scolding prepares the way for two or three more. It sours your temper, provided it was sweet, which is a question if you are prone to scold; and thus the more you scold the more you will have to scold, because you have become crosser and your children likewise.

Scolding alienates the hearts of your children. Depend upon it, they cannot love you as well after you have berated them soundly as they did before. You may reprove them with firmness and decision, you may punish with severity adequate to the nature of their offences, and they will feel the justice of your conduct and love you notwithstanding all. But they hate scolding. It stirs up the bad blood while it discloses your weakness and sinks you in their esteem. Especially at night when they are about to retire, their hearts should be melted and moulded with voices of kindness, that they may go to their slumbers with thoughts of love stealing around those souls and whispering peace.

Our neighbor Mrs. C——, is very uneven in her system. She lets her children do very much as they please, until they become so intolerably troublesome that her patience is emptied completely, then she flies at them like a fury, whips them all around, and then sits down to have "a minute's comfort," as she very pathectically expresses it. But the minute is dreadfully short. They are at mischief again, before their tears are dry, and this scene of forced submission and swift rebellion is repeated as often as might be expected, where there is no evenness of temper and no system of discipline maintained. There is no peace in her house, and never will be, although Mrs. C—— is a very excellent woman and loves her children dearly.

Mr. D——, who lives opposite, whips his children too much. They have become hickory-hardened. He is not a passionate man, but he has grown up with the idea that the rod is the best medicine for children, and as all children need to be corrected, the rod must be the appointed means. So he whips, on all possible occasions. And the occasions of course come often. His children have lost that sense of shame which they would feel most deeply had he governed with discretion, and therefore they often fall into condemnation. He has made a great mistake, but he is one of those men who know more than every body else, and consequently will never change his system.

We have been trying for some time past to mingle gentleness with firmness, patience and decision, and it seems to work well. We find that the hearts of children are not made of stone; they will yield to the tones of kindness, and impressions made by affection and authority combined, are the impressions which ought to be made on the young heart. We punish our children when they deserve punishment, and they have no idea that our love for them will ever shield them from chastisement when disobediende demands the blow. This is our system, and we mean to give it a fair experiment. Thus far it works well, and we find from year to year less occasion to use the rod, and more pleasure in observing the growing willingness of our children to regard their parents' wishes as their stongest laws. NO. 5—LATE HOURS AND THEIR ATTENDANTS.

I have shown in my last number, that in the best circumstances of late hours, the nervous energies are crippled, and the whole system is thrown into a state of excitement. My present purpose is to speak of those other circumstances which are usually, or at least frequently, attendant upon late hours, and which greatly add to their injurious tendency.

One thing of this sort is the bad air, both out of doors and within, and the alternation from one to the other. If after our third meal, at sunset, or a little later, we spend the remaining time till 8 or 9 o'clock in pleasant conversation in the family, or in the society of a few choice friends, we shall then be properly prepared for our sleep, and that sleep will probably be sweet.

But if the evening is spent in conversation too exciting, or in too large a company, or if the music, the lecture, or the sermon has been intensely interesting, there is danger to virtue, even though the hour of retiring is not remarkably late. It is one thing to retire seasonably, and quite another to retire in a condition of mind and body which favors immediate and sound sleep. Even if Somnus lays hold of the reins speedily, the imagination may be unbridled.

When, however, these unfavorable circumstances—the excitement and the bad air, (which is of itself exciting,) both—are extended to ten, eleven, twelve, or one o'clock, the danger is still more imminent than in the former case, and the consequences still more deplorable.

Sometimes, too, the employments, instead of belonging to the passive form, are of the active. These may consist of dancing, or other active amusements, or they may be out of door amusements, as sleigh-riding. The most doubtful of all these is dancing.

Now when I object to dancing as an amusement for the young, it is chiefly on account of the circumstances by which it is usually accompanied. These are conversation about the last engagement, the last party or concert, and the last novel; together with impure and highly heated air, and too often exciting refreshments. A combination of all these would be sufficiently dangerous to virtue, if the time selected were the afternoon; but late in the evening, when every brain and artery is excited, and every one burns with a miniature fever, the tendencies are sometimes almost irresistible.

Let me not be misunderstood. It is not that the immediate safety of the young in these circumstances is always endangered, but only that a work of preparation is commenced, which, if favored by future trains of licentious tendency and thought, may work out sure destruction. A small leak will, in the end, if neglected, sink the largest ship—or in plain English, the path of vice is always descending; and none who enter it, even in thought, can be sure of returning.

Connected with evening amusements, but sometimes existing independently of them, is what has sometimes been denominated night sitting. Now if it were necessary, it would be easy to show that this habit of vulgar society is not more opposed to the laws of health and purity, than it is to the whole spirit of the New Testament. But on this topic so many have spoken of late, and well spoken, that I forbear to enlarge. I will only add, that I hope, for the honor of human nature and rational society, what I have said is sufficient.

If the ends of courtship and marriage were fully and rightly understood, every thing which pertains to the society of the sexes would be divorced, forthwith, from night and darkness. If it were fully known and felt by the young, that the two great ends of marriage are to complete the education of the parties, and to begin the education of others for time and for eternity, but especially for the latter, a great change would ere long be made in the manner of settling preliminaries.

Parents would then encourage the meeting of the young at seasonable hours, viz. in the day time; and all late hours, for young or old, would be excluded. The hours on which the sun shines would not be grudged, but preferred even by the parent who is miserly. Good taste would be cultivated, health promoted, and purity be preserved.

This whole subject, as a part of youthful education, has been strangely overlooked. The young have been left as uninformed, in regard to the true ends and modes of earthly existence, as if information would be hurtful to them. The great ideas of intellectual and moral marriage, as developed by Christianity, have seldom if ever entered their heads, not even by stealth. Stealth indeed there has been, but it has been from the Prince of Darkness, and not from the Sun of Righteousness.

I do not think it will be possible wholly to divorce the subjects of courtship and marriage from darkness and its sable chieftain, till the young are duly and gradually enlightened concerning them. I know, indeed, that in particular parts of our country, and in particular conditions of society, a change has been undergone already, greatly to the advantage of truth and purity. And yet the work is but begun. Christianity will have reason to triumph whenever it shall be completed. Meanwhile let each individual do all in her power to hasten the glad day.—Christianity is not an abstraction. If it is to accomplish any thing, it is by means of Christians. Let us never suppose that without our aid, Christianity itself—nay, even its Divine Author—will achieve any conquests. One of us, though robed in humanity, must by our likeness to Christ, be able to chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight; and what we are able to do, must be done. We must put our own shoulders to the wheel—and then, and not till then, will it be serviceable to look for help from on high.

CHRISTIAN LOVE-FEASTS,

By William M. Fahnestock, M. D.

Introduction.

Mr. Editor,—Having quite recently appointed a Love-Feast, to be held at Ephrata, for my departed parents, (which is a usage in the German Seventh-day Baptist Society,) I have had many inquiries made, from different sources, respecting its object; had its propriety called into question, and much surprise expressed, that the German Seventh-day Baptists, "who profess to take the Bible as their rule of faith, and guide," should observe anything not required by the Scriptures; and accompanied by strong intimations, that there is no scriptural warrant for such an observance. I therefore penned the following article, in a letter to a correspondent, on the subject, as an explanation of my views, and to show that it is not inconsistent with, nor contrary to the Scriptures. I have since been requested to commit it to the press, and have chosen your columns for that purpose, as much interest and kind feeling has been manifested for our little branch of Zion, by the Sabbath-keeping brethren of the northern and eastern states, who lend a willing ear to the explanations of our peculiarities.

The Agapee, or Love-Feasts, were observed by the primitive Christians, in imitation of the last supper, of which our divine Redeemer partook with his disciples, in connection with the institution of the Eucharist, on the night that he was betrayed and led out as a lamb to the slaughter.

"These festivals," says Calmet, "were kept in the assembly or church, towards evening, after prayers and worship were over. Upon these occasions, the faithful ate with great simplicity and union, and after the supper they partook of the sacramental signs of the Lord's body and blood." Paul, Jude, and Peter, allude to them in their epistles. Tertullian, one of the early fathers of the church, and one of the most authoritative ecclesiastical writers, and Pliny, the historian, in a letter to the Emperor Trajan, testify to its regular observance among the believers on the Lord Jesus. I need not, therefore, take up any more space to prove it to be a scriptural practice, and not a human invention or a papal excrescence; for both sacred and profane history assert it to be a recognized usage of the church in the days of the Apostles, and which continued to be regarded as such until human authority and human dictation interfered and abolished it; as may be seen by the decrees of the Council of Laodicea, the Synod of Trullo, and the Council of Carthage.

You may admit, that they were observed by the Apostles and the primitive church, yet you may ask for a command or an example of holding one for a deceased person, or after the death of a member of the church. I may ask, in return, where have we any command to partake even of the Eucharist at any particular time? Christ said unto his disciples, "Do this in remembrance of me"—not daily, nor weekly, nor monthly—but simply "do this;" and Paul, in writing to the Corinthians on the very subject of conducting the Love-Feast, and explaining to them the institution of the Eucharist, says, "For as often as ye do eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he come." As often, is no time, unless some time be appointed. That power was left by implication with the disciples. If not, it would never be observed at all. If, then, they have power to appoint one time, they have power also to appoint any time, unless specially interdicted. It is left entirely at the discretion of the disciples, at what time and under what circumstances it should be attended to. Were the times and circumstances specified in Holy Writ, the Seventh-day Baptists would conform to it to the letter; nor add nor take one jot or tittle from it. The Agapee being recognized by the New Testament, they, where they are numerous, hold one every month, and at least two general ones during the year, and as many more as may be deemed proper or convenient. They do not look upon it as a requirement—it is no positive rite or binding regulation of the Society—but is a privilege; and as a privilege they regard it as very proper after the death of one of their number.

The members of the Society are, in a great measure, scattered abroad; few have the privilege of paying the last tribute of affection at the grave of a brother or a sister; and little opportunity is afforded them of hearing any thing correctly or satisfactorily of the last moments of those whom they love in the Lord, or of witnessing the tests and triumphs, in death, of the faith they hold in common. Every death in a little flock may be improved, may be sanctified, to those left behind. A little scattered band may be spiritually edified and benefited, by meeting, and praying, and meditating on the death of one of the fraternity, and be greatly strengthened in their faith, in a manner in which an ordinary convocation would not affect them. There are many of the brethren and sisters, who, long as it is since the bereavements have occurred, have not heard a single word of the last moments of my dear parents, yet who cherish a warm and strong attachment for their memory, and who still, even at this late period, desire to bear their sympathy and manifest their veneration, by talking of the virtues of the departed.* A familiar review of these matters and the exercises connected with it, are grateful to the heart, and encouraging to the Christian pilgrim. It keeps alive a spirit of confraternity, and binds us closer together, as we see one by one dropping by the way into the cold and silent grave.

These are some of the considerations which show the authority and the propriety of holding a Love-Feast—a mingling of hearts—a weeping with those that weep, and a rejoicing with those that do rejoice. I might add some others, but as a departure from scriptural warrant has been imputed to the Society for this observance, and as we often see some matters more clearly by contrast and comparison, I will here remark, that there are many things deemed essential to true piety in the heart for which we have no express Scripture command, and yet to which the religious world, without any distinction of sect, yield implicit obedience, and most scrupulously observe.

Where is the command or direct evidence of women partaking of the communion? Yet should we regard any church as passing its bounds in administering it to them? It is merely inferred, as a privilege, which we all assign to them. There is a propriety in it, and we cheerfully accord it.

Have we any requirement to hold prayer-meetings? They are a privilege, a great privilege; they are the evidences of vitality in a church; there is much propriety in them, and much good accomplished by them.

Where have we any command to establish daily worship in our families? It is a great, an inestimable privilege. There is a propriety in it, and it is doubtless well-pleasing in the sight of God our Maker.

Would you charge any individual church with departure from scriptural warrant for attending to any or all the foregoing? The Seventh-day Baptists are no more out of the way, in selecting the occurrence of bereavement by death for holding a Love-Feast, which is not appointed to any times or seasons, but which is left at the option of the disciples, whenever they shall elect proper. Does the admonition, "Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together," direct when and under what circumstances?—and does it interdict any period? If we do meet on the Sabbath, which may be inferred, does it prohibit or does it require us to meet during the week? Is it improper to do so? As, then, there is no time commanded, nor any period prohibited, for assembling ourselves together to eat the bread of love, and partake of the elements of the body and blood of our blessed Master, the Society deems it proper, very appropriate, after a death among them; for when we experience an afflictive dispensation, a personal bereavement, we are more apt to appreciate the death, the cruel death, of Him who gave himself to purchase us by his blood, as grain is more likely to take root after the fallow ground has been broken up.

Death is a solemn, an awful event, both in a family and in a Society. It is too solemn an event to be "lost sight of," or ever be "forgotten by the lapse of time." It behooves us to meditate upon it not only at the moment, but frequently, while we sojourn amid the distracting cares of this absorbing world. Moore very correctly says:—

> It is not the tear at the moment shed,
>   When the cold turf has just been lain o'er him,
> That can tell how beloved is the soul that's fled,
>   Or how deep in our hearts we deplore him,
> 'Tis the tear through many a long day wept,
>   Through a life by his life all shaded,
> 'Tis the sad remembrance fondly kept
>   When all other griefs are faded.

Mrs. Hemans touchingly admonishes us to

> Forsake them not! though now their name
>   Be but a mournful sound,
> Though by the earth its utterance claim
>   A stillness round.

* * * * * * *

> They have a breathing influence there
>   A charm not elsewhere found,
> Sad—yet it sanctifies the air,
>   The stream, the ground.

And Dr. Young pertinently asks:—

> Why are friends ravished from us? 'Tis to bind,
> By soft affection's ties, on human hearts,
> The thought of death, which reason, too supine
> Or misemployed, so rarely fastens there.

And again significantly indicates that

> Death stands like Mercuries, in ev'ry way,
> And kindly points us to our journey's end.

Not like Oracles uttering an occasional alarm, but like planted indexes, permanent hand-boards, pointing all the while to our journey's end.

I regard death as too solemn, too awful an event, ever to be "worn out" or "passed away." The maxim of the world, and what is sometimes called the philosophy of the world, is, "Look not back into the past, it comes not back again. Wisely improve the present—it is thine. Go forth to meet the shadowy future, without fear, and with a manly heart."* That the philosophy of the world!—it is the infidelity of the world. I think we are much better prepared to meet the "shadowy future," by looking back into the past, and that we improve the present best, by looking into the future through the mournful sepulchre; as it is by the still solemn breathings of the tomb, that the language of our souls is attuned to the voices of the dear departed, with whom we are soon to be united and spend the endless ages of eternity in spiritual discourse and worship. It is good, then, and profitable too, to turn to the past, and meditate solemnly on the future. It is even profitable to dedicate special seasons to meditation on mournful subjects, and such contemplations are often productive not only of much comfort but of positive good. I do not confine the period of "sanctifying influence" from a visitation of death, to the time "at which it takes place," but regard it as extending to all subsequent time, whenever we give it a prayerful consideration, and permit it to have its intended effect upon us; and therefore still desire to hold a Love-Feast for my dear sainted parents, believing that it may be sanctified anew to my own soul and be blessed to the eternal welfare of others.

The expression of holding it for my parents does not convey its full import or significance in English language. It may be illustrated by an anecdote related by Bishop Heber, of one of the boatmen with whom he traveled in the upper provinces of India, who every day set apart a certain portion of his rice, and bestowed it on the birds, saying, "It is not I but my child that feeds you." He had lost an only son, some years before, and the boy having been in the custom of feeding the birds in this way, the parent never omitted doing so at sunset in his name—for his sake—in his stead. I do not give this as the most correct interpretation of the original motive for holding a Love-Feast on these occasions, but it is a sentiment which accords very much with the feelings which impelled me to its consummation. The Agapee, or Love Feasts, in the primitive churches, were emphatically "feasts of friendship," "feasts of kindness," "feasts of charity." My dear parents regarded them as the tenderest expression of paternal affection, approved of their observance for the above purpose, and never felt happier than when mingling in these exercises. It was my happy lot to enjoy one of those seasons with them. It was one of the happiest moments of my life, to eat the bread of sanctified love with them, and drink of the wine of which we can partake no more until we meet at the great feast of the Beloved, in the golden city above. I know how they loved this exercises of pious devotion. It is what they would have wished to be their last engagement upon earth; had it been permitted to them, they would have rejoiced to hold this feast of love in their last moments, with their brethren and sisters in Christ, and then have mounted from their midst, to the beatific regions of the blessed. Yes, I am assured, that it would have been their greatest happiness, to have spent their last hour in such a Love-Feast, and have thus manifested, in their expiring moments, their enduring pledge of affection and fidelity. What they could not do, I, their son, wish to imitate for them, confident that it will rejoice their spirits, are they permitted to look down from the courts of heaven, and behold the transactions of the sanctuary wherein they delighted to assemble, while upon earth, and mingle in its holy exercises.

To hold this Love-Feast, for their sake, I design, God willing, to make a pilgrimage of love to old Ephrata about the middle of this month, and there on their grave, as it were, and before the witnessing church, dedicate my children to the Lord; for I could never regard them as buried until this Love-Feast should be held for them, and their departure be realized by their absence from the circle of that little band of the faithful.

To understand correctly the concluding paragraph, it is necessary to state, that my parents resided and died at Harrisburgh, Pa., forty miles from Ephrata, at which latter place they have not regular preaching, except at Love-Feasts, at which time part of the Snowhill branch of the society assemble with them, (which is ninety miles distant.) On these occasions, my parents always attended; and no meeting of the kind has been held there since their death. The dedication of children of believing parents is a practice of the Society, in obedience to the saying of our Lord and Master, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God." "And he took them up in his arms and put his hands upon and blessed them;" which we attempt to imitate, by presenting them to the Lord, before the church, with the laying on of hands and prayer by the senior Elder: but which we do not consider as conferring any of the privileges of church membership. It is merely making a public dedication of them to the Lord, and introducing them to the care of the church; always regarding baptism, upon faith and repentance, as the initiatory rite into the church, and requisite to full fellowship.

VICTORY OVER DEATH.

Dying saints have given multiplied testimonies to the power of religion in the hour of trial. Here are some of them, the reading of which should encourage the doubting and admonish the careless.

Cyprian—"Let him only fear death, who must pass from this death to the second death."

John Dodd—"I am not afraid to look death in the face. I can say, Death, where is thy sting?—death cannot hurt me."

Robert Bolton—"O! when will this good hour come? When shall I be dissolved? When shall I be with Christ?"

Halyburton—"Here is a demonstration of the reality of religion, that I, a poor, weak, timorous man, as much afraid of death as any, am now enabled by the power of grace, composedly and with joy, to look death in the face."

Rutherford—"It is no easy thing to be a Christian; but for me, I have got the victory, and Christ is holding out both his arms to embrace me."

Mrs. Joyce Lewis, when she was condemned to be burnt for the Protestant religion, said, "As for death, I fear it not; for when I behold the amiable countenance of Jesus Christ, my dear Saviour, the ugly face of death does not much trouble me."

Edward Deering—"As for my death, I bless God I feel and find so much inward joy and comfort to my soul, that if it were put to my choice whether I would die or live, I would a thousand times rather choose death than life, if it may stand with the holy will of God."

John Owen—"Oh! brother Payne, the long looked for day is come at last, in which I shall see that glory in another manner than I have ever yet done, or was capable of doing."

Risdon Darracott—"Well, I am going from weeping friends to congratulating angels and rejoicing saints in heaven and glory. Blessed be God, all is well."

THE GERMAN WATCHMEN'S SONG.

Among the watchmen in Germany, a singular custom prevails, of chanting devotional hymns as well as songs of a national or amusing character. Of the former description of pieces, the following is a specimen, the several stanzas being chanted as the hours of the night are successively announced.

> Hark! ye neighbors, and hear me tell—
> Ten now strikes on the belfry bell!
> Ten are the holy commandments given
> To man below, from God in Heaven.
>
> CHORUS.
>
> Human watch from harm can't ward us,
> God will watch and God will guard us;
> He, through his eternal might,
> Grant us all a blessed night.
>
> Hark! ye neighbors, and hear me tell—
> Eleven sounds on the belfry bell!
> Eleven apostles of holy mind,
> Taught the Gospel to mankind.
> Human watch, &c.
>
> Hark! ye neighbors, and hear me tell—
> Twelve resounds from the belfry bell!
> Twelve disciples to Jesus came,
> Who suffered rebuke for their Savior's name.
> Human watch &c.
>
> Hark! ye neighbors, and hear me tell—
> One has pealed on the belfry bell!
> One God above, one Lord indeed,
> Who bears us forth in hour of need.
> Human watch, &c.
>
> Hark! ye neighbors, and hear me tell—
> Two resounds from the belfry bell!
> Two paths before mankind are free,
> Neighbors choose the best for thee.
> Human watch, &c.
>
> Hark! ye neighbors, and hear me tell—
> Three now resounds from the belfry bell!
> Threefold reigns the Heavenly Host,
> Father, Son, and Holy Ghost!
> Human watch, &c.

THE APPROACH TO JERUSALEM FROM JAFFA.

BY W. H. BARTLETT.

After the storm of the night, the morning air was exquisitely fresh—the blue arch of heaven most glorious. We felt that we were in the 'land of the East, the clime of the sun;' but a few hours' ride from the object of our pilgrimage. And beautiful were the gardens of Jaffa, through which we rode. Here the 'lofty palm' rose gracefully into the sky, charged with her clusters of dates, and rustling with the softest of sounds in the summer air. The broad, dark-leaved, overhanging fig, dropped her fruit into the path. The golden citron, with the delicate vermillion-flowered pomegranate, and the clustering vine, richly mantle over the soil. Beneath the deep shade of the carob-tree the white-veiled women group around the fountain. The Arab sheik, his dusk face, piercing eyes, and white teeth, overshadowed by his golden-striped head-dress, comes by on his glossy Arabian, his gun and sword and brilliant trappings glittering in the sun; or a long file of camels, charged with merchandize, on which women and children are generally seated, slowly paces on, projecting their strange shadows on the sand. Every object is novel and oriental in character, and independent of its picturesque beauty, is linked by a delicious association with our earliest dreams of Biblical scenery and incident. Such are the chances of oriental travel; days of weariness and nights of watching;—but then hours when enjoyment is intense, and whose recollection is indelible.

Three hours' ride brought us to Ramla, beautifully situated above the plain of 'Loudd,' Lydda and Saron, (Sharon,) among groves of palm and olive. We made no stay here, anxious to arrive, if possible, that night at Jerusalem; but in crossing the plain we encountered the noon-tide heat of a Syrian sun, and were annoyed by swarms of gnats, and parched by intolerable thirst. The water in our leather bottles was soon exhausted, and had not the peasant girls brought us a welcome supply, as we passed through the villages, anxious to gain a few paras from the passing stranger, we should have suffered cruelly. In the afternoon, just as we entered the hills, we came upon a well by the road-side, most welcome to us in 'that dry and thirsty land.' Grouped around were a motly host of tired wayfarers. The Arab sheik, letting down his leathern skin into the well, drew water to supply his fainting steed, drinking from a hollow stone. Flocks of glossy-haired goats and sheep, with loud bleatings, surrounded the appointed trough, which it required the constant labor of several women to keep full. Caravans of camels, relieved of their burdens, were reposing around, their drivers crowding to the well. We were as weary and thirsty as the rest; and letting down our water-skins, took long and repeated draughts of the reviving element, and stretched in the shadow of a huge rock, enjoyed a most welcome 'siesta.' In the afternoon we resumed our course, threading narrow gorges, where a few resolute men might keep an army at bay; and from thence ascending hill after hill, round and rocky, yet bearing on the summits neat villages surrounded by olive groves and corn. Upon one of these we descended 'at shut of eve,' and its sheltered, beautiful appearance irresistibly invited us to repose. This proved, on inquiry, to be Kiryat el Enab, the ancient Kirjah Jearim. On the flat roof of the principal house the 'elders' of the village were seated, quietly chatting and smoking in the coolness of the evening air. We applied for a resting-place, and were conducted to the court of a mosque, in the centre of which were a tall graceful palm and a fountain; and shortly after the sheik, of the family of Abu Gosh, sent us some dishes for our supper, and came down himself to visit us.

Notwithstanding our fatigue, and the inviting nature of our quarters, we found it impossible to sleep. We were but three hours' distance from Jerusalem. Rising at midnight, we pursued our way by the light of the innumerable stars—glorious in the blue depth of an Asian sky. Not a sound was heard but the tramp of our horses' hoofs upon the rocky pathway. The outlines of the hilly region we were traveling were dim and indistinct; far grander than they would have appeared by the light of the day. We came to a tremendous descent, long and slippery, over slabs of rock, and deep gullies worn by the winter rains. With many a slide, and narrow escape from falling headlong, we reached the bottom of the valley in safety, where we found caravans of camels and asses, with their guides asleep by the wayside, waiting for the morning light to enter the city gates. We pursued our way—an hour yet remained—that hour was one of strange and indescribable excitement. I had seen, by moonlight, the time-hallowed glories of the old world, and the wonders of the new;—I had stood alone at that hour, within the awful circle of the Coliseum; and watched the lunar rainbow spanning the eternal mists rising from the base of Niagara;—but this night's march across the desolate hills of India awoke a more sublime, more thrilling interest. I was approaching the walls of that city (the scene of events which must ever remain the most touching in their influence upon the human heart,) which I had long and earnestly hoped to see, and my wish was about to be realized. As the stars began to fade from the heavens, and the dawn to break over the eastern mountains, I sought to pierce the gloom which wrapped the silent region around; but nothing could be distinguished. It was not till the first red glow of morning glanced upon the eastward hill-tops that I caught sight of the city. But there was nothing grand or striking in the vision—a line of dull walls, a group of massive towers, a few dark olives, rising from a dead and sterile plain; yet, enough that this was Jerusalem, the Holy City; her mournful aspect well suits with the train of recollections she awakens.

We had to wait some time outside the Jaffa Gate before admittance could be obtained, and not a sound was heard when we entered the silent streets. Within, the city is as dull as without; ruinous heaps and mean houses meet the eye as we enter. The stern Tower of Hippicus is on our right—a noble wreck of the past.

AGITATIONS IN THE SOUTH OF FRANCE.

A letter from M. Armand Courtois, one of the three brothers, bankers at Toulouse, on whom devolves much of the responsibility of conducting and supporting the Toulouse Book and Tract Society, informs that in Saintonge, about 40 communes (or townships) are turning from popery to the Gospel. A great work is also going on near Limoges; and laborers are needed to second the work, which "reminds of the outpouring of the Holy Ghost at the time of the Reformation." Two colporteurs have been sent to Saintonge to evangelize and sell books.

A very deep interest has been awakened by the imprisonment of the Abbe Maurette, who had published the Farewell to Rome, and who was condemned to one year's confinement and a fine of 600 francs "because he had attempted to attack a religion acknowledged by the state." He is a man of God, and is commended to the prayers and sympathies of all who know the power of prayer.

Professor De Felice was also about to publish an excellent work on the duty of reading the Bible. It is written in a popular, attractive style, and ably refutes the objections against the universal reading of the word of God. The elements are in motion in France, and it is with God to overrule the struggles of true Christianity with the Man of Sin for the highest advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom. [Am. Mess.

Tracts.—It is said that the American Tract Society has issued tracts to the amount of more than $100,000 within the last seven months, being more than double their issues in the corresponding period last year.

"A considerable portion of these issues are in languages spoken by foreign emigrants, such as German, French, Swedish, Italian, &c. About 20,000,000 pages have been distributed gratuitously in destitute districts and poor families. The number of volumes sent forth in seven months, is not far from 300,000. A very large part of the issues have been sent to distant and destitute parts of the country for circulation, by the hands of about 100 colporteurs, including 28 German and French, in twenty-three different States and Territories. The important bearings of such immense issues, on the intellectual, moral, and religious condition of our teeming population, cannot but be regarded with deep interest by every enlightened patriot and liberal Christian."

Ministers' Account.—At a meeting of ministers, an aged servant of God represented the Judge as calling upon those who had been preachers of his word to render up their final account, and proceeded in this manner: To the first—"What was your inducement to preach my word?" He replied, "To secure a good living." "Stand by," said the Judge, "you have received your reward." To the second—"And what did you preach for?" "To display my learning and eloquence, and gain popularity." "Stand by; you have received your reward." To the third—"And why did you preach?" He humbly replied, "To make known unto men salvation by the cross, and win souls to thee." "Room, saints! room, angels!" said the Judge; "let my faithful servant enter into the joy of his Lord!"

The ministers retired from the meeting with great searchings of heart.

Christian Liberality.—The patriarch Abraham gave one-tenth of all his possessions to religious uses; and so did Jacob, and many other Old Testament worthies. And it is worthy of notice that the Jews, who, as a nation, gave more to religious purposes than any other people, were, as a nation, more prosperous and wealthy than any other that ever existed. Even the heathen—the Arabians, according to Pliny, and the Grecians, according to Xenophon and Herodotus—gave no less than a tenth part of every thing to sacred uses. And shall the Christian do less for his God than did the Jews under the old dispensation, or the heathen for their idols?

* At the time of the death of my father, my mother's health was so exceedingly frail, as to leave very little expectation of her surviving him any length of time, which induced me to defer this observance, to hold one for both together. She survived him nearly two years, and since her departure to the world of spirits, circumstances entirely beyond my control have delayed it until the present month.

THE LAW AND THE GOSPEL.

NECESSARY PARTS OF ONE AND THE SAME SCHEME.

An impression is often conveyed, that the Gospel is another plan from that which was at first proposed, and that its terms of salvation are much easier than were formerly held out. The root of this seems to be a supposition, that the law, which originally required perfect and universal obedience, is now satisfied with partial obedience. The absurdity of such a view will be apparent, if we consider what is meant by law. It is a rule of conduct, uniform and stated—a rule by which our actions may be regulated, and a standard by which they may be judged. Now what is implied in the supposition that the law is satisfied with partial obedience? Just this—that the law does not require what it does require—which is absurd. The law, therefore, must be either wholly abolished, or else nothing less than perfect obedience can satisfy its demands. And since the idea of duty and transgression rests upon the existence of a law requiring one and forbidding the other, to suppose the modification of this law, is to suppose that right and duty are arbitrary and changeable.

But we are not left to mere inferences upon a point of such vital importance. The inspired records have spoken concerning it. That the law is not satisfied with obedience to some of its precepts, while others are neglected, the apostle Paul says distinctly, when he gives his approval to the declaration, "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law to do them." The Apostle James testifies to the same thing, when he says, "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." There is no middle course. The moral law, of which the Decalogue is an inspired summary, is perfect, and universal in its application. It can require nothing less than perfect and universal obedience.

There are two considerations which serve more directly to illustrate the position, that the law and the gospel are parts of the same scheme:—

1. All those who have been saved from among the children of men have received their salvation through the Gospel. Immediately after the fall, a promise was given to our first parents, that "The seed of the woman shall break the serpent's head." The "seed of the woman" here spoken of, is generally allowed to refer to Christ. To the fulfillment of this promise, Adam looked forward with hope; and if it is his privilege to stand accepted before God, he does so through faith in the Redeemer here promised. This truth is not peculiar to Adam; it runs through the whole current of inspired history from Adam to Christ. Abraham, for instance, believed that in his seed all nations should be blessed; and so strong was his faith, that he was ready to offer up Isaac on the sacrificial altar. From this it is evident, that he understood the promise as referring not alone to Isaac; and it is reasonable to suppose, that he understood it in the same manner as did the apostle Paul, when he said, "his seed, which is Christ." Thus the Scripture "preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, in thee shall all nations be blessed;" and thus "Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness,"—just as the faith of the gospel is now counted for righteousness to those that believe. Moses, likewise, saw the same way to the favor of God as did Abraham. And when he chose "rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, esteeming the reproaches of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt," not less than when he spoke of the Prophet whom the Lord God would raise up after him—Moses had a vision of the glories of the Redeemer's kingdom, and received the end of his faith, even salvation through Christ. And what shall we say more? for time would fail us to speak of Gedeon, and of Barak, and of Samson, of David also, and of Samuel, and of the Prophets, all of whom, "having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promises—God having provided some better thing for us, that they, without us, should not be made perfect." In other words, that the gospel should be added to the law in order to the perfection of the scheme.

2. The second consideration is drawn from the Saviour's exposition of the design of his mission. His Sermon on the Mount contains a very explicit statement of the relation which he sustained to those who had preceded him. Among the multitudes gathered about him and listened eagerly to his words, there seems to have been some who expected he would bring in an easier mode of religious living. This he first opposed by pointing out some classes of men whom he esteemed blessed; they were the poor in spirit, the pure in heart, and such as hunger and thirst after righteousness. He then comes directly to answer their expectations. "Think not," says he, "that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled." "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." He then, in illustration of this broad assertion, explained the commandment "Thou shalt not kill," as forbidding anger; and declared that instead of being satisfied to love their friends and hate their enemies, men ought to love their enemies. He thus showed, that the dispensation which he came to introduce would not set men free from the obligation by which they had formerly been bound. On the contrary, he explained the extent and spirituality of the commandments, and enforced obedience to them by his example and his words. An examination of the Gospels will evince to most minds, that neglect or modification of the law was nowhere countenanced by Jesus Christ, the Head of the Christian dispensation.

Numerous passages bearing upon this subject may be found in the apostolic writings. The declaration of Paul, "The law was our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ," shows what relation he supposed to exist between the law and the gospel. It was such that one naturally led to the other; and both were necessary to the completeness of the divine scheme. Again he says, "Is the law sin? Nay, I had not known sin, except by the law." In the same chapter, he expresses his esteem of the law by saying, "I delight in the law of God after the inward man. With the mind I myself serve the law of God." It had given him just views of sin, and been the means of bringing him to Christ; in heart, therefore, he delighted in and served it. What the law was to this Apostle, it is to every true believer—a part of the great plan by which man is to be redeemed from the power of sin, and introduced to a life of faith and holiness.

IS IT SIN TO BREAK THE SUNDAY?

In our remarks upon the reformatory movements of the day, we suggested that the looseness which obtains in regard to the observance of the first day of the week, is traceable to the opinions of men concerning its claims upon them, quite as much as to that corruption of heart which despises the restraints of divine law. Perhaps some may consider this as a plea in justification of that large class of persons, who spend the day in amusement, or as their inclinations may otherwise lead them. We are not, however, disposed to justify them one whit farther than truth demands. We will not deny, that in many instances, those who break the Sunday are guilty of sin. But their sin consists not in the overt act, but in the intention of their hearts. They do not violate the letter of the law, but they mean to do so. God's law takes account both of the outward act, and of the intents of the heart. No matter what be the outward act, if it springs from an intention to dishonor God, or from a heart that is indifferent whether God is dishonored or not, His all searching eye detects sin. On this principle, a Sunday-breaker may possibly be guilty of sin. He may really suppose that the day he is dishonoring is the Sabbath which the word of God requires him to keep holy. Of course, by not keeping it he manifests a disposition to set light by the restraints of the divine law—a disposition which would lead him to break the true Sabbath, if he were acquainted with it. We do not justify such conduct; we enter no plea in its behalf. Upon a disposition thus manifested, God, no doubt, looks with displeasure. Nay, we have no great difficulty in believing, that in some instances where a reckless wantonness is apparent, he attests his displeasure by the retributions of his providence. Yet if he does, it is a false logic which infers that such retributions are the seal of Sunday's sacredness. They are merely the seal of the sacredness of that principle in the divine law, which says, we shall not even intend to do wickedly; a principle which God, in all the administration of his moral government, has been pleased to guard with the closest care. Let those people, therefore, who honestly believe Sunday to be the Sabbath of divine appointment, keep it.

But there are multitudes who refuse to keep the day, not because they are unwilling to obey the law of God, but because they do not feel that the law requires it. Their conduct is not in spite of their convictions, but rather the result of them. We speak not of professing Christians particularly, but of those called the world's people. For such persons we stand up in defence. We maintain, that they are not guilty of sin in breaking the Sunday, either in the outward act, or in the intention of their hearts. Not in the outward act, for the law of God requires the seventh day, not the first; and not in the intention of their hearts, for all the religious instruction they enjoy does not even make them think it to be a holy day. True, they hear a great deal said about the sin of Sabbath-breaking—which in the vocabulary of their teachers means Sunday-breaking;—but how the divine canon, which says so expressly "the seventh day," is made to enjoin the keeping of another day, is perfectly incomprehensible to them. Hence a sense of obligation to it is not awakened in their minds. At the very most, all the conscience they have is the lingering remnant of what was instilled into them during childhood, to which, however, their mature judgment does not subscribe. It is no very common thing for such persons, when pressed to keep Sunday, to object openly, that the Book says, "the seventh day is the Sabbath." The teacher, by way of meeting the objection, perhaps endeavors to show how the Sabbath was changed; and they, being quite unskilled in theological controversy, and hardly daring, in face of all the learning of nearly the whole Christian world, to depend on their own judgment, yield a sort of outward, half-hearted assent, being silenced, but not convinced. In other cases, though no attempt is made to advance the objection openly, it is nevertheless felt.

"How do you know it is felt, if it is not uttered?" asks our opponent. We'll tell you. Whenever we go into a neighborhood where the first day of the week is the only day observed, and begin to broach our sentiments, it is nothing uncommon to hear it said, "Well, I always thought that was the true doctrine." "I never could see into this change of the day." Such expressions will be made by scores of honest people. No matter where we go, we are sure to hear them; so that we know the objection is felt, and that very extensively too, even if it is not spoken.

Now how are such persons guilty of sin in refusing to keep the Sunday? For the life of us, we cannot see. They neither outwardly violate God's holy law, nor do they mean to do so. Yet it is the fashion with our modern reformers to place these in the same class with others, and denounce them all en masse as "sinners before the Lord exceedingly."

We dare say, some of our opponents, on reading this—that is, if their bigotry will allow them to read any thing on our side of the question—will knit their brows somewhat. Indeed, we may think ourselves pretty well off, if they do not brand us as "the adversaries of Judah," and charge us with the sin of "weakening their hands, and disturbing them in building." But do not be disturbed, good brethren. You yourselves know it is all true that we say. You are so well aware of it, that you can't write a book, without betraying your misgivings, that your own reasoning is too weak to take hold of the conscience. For you always take good care to put in, by way of salvo, 'that if the argument for the change of the Sabbath should fail, it still would not follow that there is no Sabbath, but only that the seventh day ought to be kept.' Aye, sure enough. We have not troubled Israel, then; but you, and your father's house, "in that ye have forsaken the commandments of the Lord." Come back, one and all of you, to the commandments of the Lord, and you will then have no difficulty in taking hold of the consciences of men. You will have some materials to make conscience of; and will not have to leave a hole open for your escape, in case your disciples put it home to you about the insufficiency of your proofs.

Although we have admitted that the individual who honestly believes Sunday is the Sabbath of divine appointment, is justified in keeping it, it does not hence follow that his belief sanctifies the act, so as to make it right. His believing it to be the Sabbath does not make it so. It may be but a popish festival after all; and if so, no degree of sincerity on his part will make it any thing else. His principal sin, however, lies not in doing what he supposes to be right, but in not laying himself out to investigate whether it really is right. It is as much his duty to investigate, as it is to act; for vain is our worship when it consists in the traditions of men. Matt. 15: 9. The means of knowledge—the Scriptures—are at hand, and God makes it our duty to search them. Those who refuse to investigate, when the providence of God calls them to it, are but little less guilty than those who do what they already know to be wrong. *

PRISON REFORM MEETING.

A meeting was recently held in this city for the purpose of organizing an Association for the Reform of Prisons and their Inmates. Many interesting facts and statistics were presented, going to show the power of kindness over prisoners, and the necessity of systematic efforts to reform and protect those who have been discharged. Out of the 954 inmates of Sing Sing prison, 27 were committed under 17 years of age; 192, or about one-fifth of the whole, were committed under 21 years of age; and 599, or about two-thirds, under 30 years of age. Most of the prisoners can read; nearly one-half of them have been of temperate habits; and three-fourths have never before been in prison. From Sing Sing prison, 800 convicts have been discharged within three years, and from 150 of this number, who have been carefully followed, it was ascertained that but 50 returned to crime, while 100 lived virtuous. From these and similar facts, the encouragement to labor for their reformation, and the duty of doing it, were argued. After much deliberation, a society was organized, to be known as the Prison Association of New York, devoted to the following objects:—

1. The melioration of the condition of prisoners, whether detained for trial or finally convicted, or as witnesses.

2. The improvement of Prison Discipline and the government of prisons, whether for cities, counties or States.

3. The support and encouragement of reformed convicts after their discharge by affording them the means of obtaining an honest livelihood and sustaining them in their efforts at reform.

RELIGIOUS WANTS OF THE WEST.

It is to be regretted, that so few of the professedly pious men who remove to the far west, take a decided stand in favor of the religious improvement of the community in which they settle. Some of these pioneers are undoubtedly consistent and most useful men; but in many cases, their religious character is hardly known, while in others it is only known as a reproach to the cause they were bound to honor. At the present time, when so much is said about the condition and wants of the West, we are glad to see that this subject is receiving attention. There is no reason why the private Christian, who goes to some new district, should not go with the spirit of an ambassador of Christ, as well as the technical preacher. Until this is the case, the minister's work will be exceedingly difficult, and comparatively fruitless. Read the following testimony from a missionary on the ground:

"You are often told that more ministers are wanted at 'the West.' This is true—very true; but there are other classes of Christians wanted here, in my opinion, quite as much. I mean consistent, staunch private members, men and women of sound principles, of established moral character, of firm, unbending integrity and active piety. We want them for deacons, for leaders of our devotional singing, for superintendents and teachers in our Sunday schools, for every good work and word; indeed, for living epistles in practical godliness, to be read by all men; and, as farmers, mechanics, professional men or merchants—especially the latter; they would have abundant opportunity for usefulness in these departments of Christian effort, while their vocations would afford them a good support. There are hundreds who could be spared from the East, and I long for the time to arrive when professors of these classes will be found by hundreds, making sacrifices of temporal ease and comfort, and immigrating hither as servants of the Lord, to aid their brethren in the mighty work which is exhausting their energies, and, sometimes, discouraging their souls."

THE TRUE WESLEYAN.

This paper copies our comments upon an article by one of its correspondents, and accompanies them with the following remarks:—

"We have no personal responsibility in this matter, as the article in question was not admitted into the columns of the Wesleyan by us, nor did we ever read it, or know that such an article was published until we saw the above. This is the first number of the Wesleyan issued under our direct editorial supervision. We do not say this because we wish to shrink from the responsibility involved, far be it from us; we hold the views which we suppose the writer intended to express. But we do not feel ourselves bound to defend those views at the demand of the Recorder. We have a right to publish our views, and he has a right to deny them, but we do not admit that his call for proof lays us under obligation to produce it, further than we have a free mind so to do. From the language of the denial it is clear that his mind is made up, and that no proof would prove the points in his estimation, and we do not know that a discussion with him, on the subject, would result in great good to the world.

"When the writer says, 'the question is settled in the minds of all pious, sensible men,' we do not suppose he designed to be understood to mean that there are no pious, sensible men, such as the editor of the Sabbath Recorder, who entertain different views; all that is meant, is, that it is settled in the minds of such men generally, that nearly all the Christian world hold these views. If the editor of the Recorder is disposed to deny this, let him take hold of the laboring oar himself, and go into a calculation and show us what proportion of professed Christians regard the first day of the week as a divinely appointed Sabbath, and what proportion keep the seventh day, and what proportion have no Sabbath. We know very well that the fact that most men regard the first day as the Sabbath by divine appointment, does not make it so, or prove that it is so, but, surely, it proves all that the writer designed to prove by it, viz. that it is not necessary to prove it. There is certainly less necessity of proving what most men believe, than what is generally disbelieved. If the seventh day is still the Sabbath, as most men do not believe it, there is the greatest necessity of proving this, and our friend of the Recorder is free to commence his work as soon as he pleases. We will not forbid him. And should he see fit to assert it without proof, we do not know that we should demand the proof of him, as he has done by us. If he should feel safe to risk it upon his assertion, without proof, we should not feel very much concerned about it."

REMARKS.

This is an exceedingly indefinite answer to a very plain article. It first denies all personal responsibility in the matter, and afterwards partly assumes the responsibility. It talks about each of our positions, but neither answers nor refuses to answer either of them. It neither affirms nor denies anything vital to the question at issue. It is, in short, a complete specimen of non-committalism. There are, however, several things pretty nearly said, which may deserve some notice. The position that a man has a right to make assertions through the medium of a public journal, and yet a call for proof lays him under no obligation to produce it, seems to us untenable and dangerous. Our law-makers have decided, that for a person to make an assertion in this way concerning the most trivial thing, lays him under obligation to prove his assertion when called upon, or suffer the consequences. But has a religious teacher a right to make assertions in regard to religious things, and yet incur no responsibility to prove his assertions? We are sure the Apostle did not think so, when he said, "Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you." And when we see an unwillingness to give this reason we always think there is difficulty in finding it. Again, it seems strange to us, that a man should refuse to prove his assertions, because the person who asks for such proof has already "made up his mind"—the very reason, we should think, why all the proof to be obtained should be given him. There are several other things equally enigmatical to us, but upon which we will not take room to remark, because they have nothing to do with the real question.

As the editor has turned over to us the "laboring oar," which he ought to have taken himself, of showing what proportion of Christians regard the first day of the week as divinely appointed for the Sabbath, we will simply refer him to an article in our paper of Nov. 28, where he will find proof that the proportion is very small—far enough from including "all pious, sensible men."

Without saying another word concerning the above extract, we have now two propositions to make to the editor of the Wesleyan, either one or both of which he is respectfully invited to accept.

1. If he will prepare an article proving, or attempting to prove, that the first day of the week has been divinely appointed as the Sabbath, and is still binding, we will cheerfully give it a place in the columns of the Recorder, for the enlightening of the few who think differently. Or—

2. We will prepare an article proving, or attempting to prove, that the seventh day of the week has been divinely appointed as the Sabbath, and is still binding, on condition that he will give it a place in the columns of the Wesleyan, for the enlightening of those who think differently.

Will he accept either proposition?

COMBAT.—There is a prospect of another "No Church, no Bishop" controversy, the Rev. James Richmond having challenged Dr. Potts to single oral and public combat on that question.

OUTRAGES UPON THE JEWS.

AT PRAGUE.—In July a riot was caused by the railway laborers at Prague, the object of which was to obtain higher wages. When the rioters had been dispersed by the military, the populace turned their fury against the Jews, maltreated many individuals in the street, and destroyed much property. It is stated that 2000 Israelites have left Prague on account of these aggressions, and that they have been expelled from several other villages of Hungary. A similar excitement occurred during the preceding month, in consequence of a strike among the workmen in the cotton-factories, the populace having taken part with the workmen against the masters, a majority of whom were Jews.

JEWS IN MOROCCO.

Sad intelligence is communicated by Mr. Levi, a missionary to the Jews of Morocco. During the bombardment of Magadore by the French, the English Consul was not permitted to leave the town. When he did leave it, after having been plundered of every thing, he informed the missionary that the Jews suffered a great deal. A party of them, more than fifty in number, escaped to a neighboring village, but were massacred there. In his last communication, dated Gibralter, Aug. 29, Mr. Levi says: "It is to be feared that at the present time, out of the 4,000 or 5,000 Jews at Magadore, not a third are alive—some buried under the ruins, some killed by the Moors from the country, and others starved to death. Thus we see that the Lord's ways are past finding out, and his judgments unsearchable."

PERSECUTION IN MADEIRA.

By a letter from Dr. Robert R. Kalley, dated Madeira, Sept. 27, which we find in the London Times, it appears that the work of persecution is still going on there. During the summer many readers of the Bible had been beaten, some by day on the public roads, and others by night after their houses had been broken open. On the 24th of September, an officer with fifty soldiers surrounded several houses, stripped them of whatever was valuable, and took twenty-seven prisoners. These are confined at Funchal, denied all communication with their friends, and not allowed to have even food given them. Besides those in prison, there is a large number in hidings, in caves and dens of the earth. The letter says, "All this is perpetrated without a cause, without a shadow of excuse. The only reason why they are maltreated, in point of fact, is because they read God's word, and seek to follow its dictates, notwithstanding the opposition of men."

For the Recorder.

RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE.

Whatever trade or profession a man is inclined to pursue, a full understanding of its requirements is necessary to success. What, for instance, advances the statesman, but political knowledge? Is it not speculative skill that enriches the merchant? and inventive ingenuity that exalts the mechanic? Even those ordinary affairs of life, to be properly discharged, must be perfectly understood. Shall we then suppose, that a high state of piety and virtue may be attained, while giving but a partial attention to its concerns, or with a limited and imperfect understanding of its duties?

Whatever may be said of the happiness attendant upon a course of undeviating rectitude, it is a course of peculiar difficulty to unassisted human nature. Amidst the allurements that are here presented to arouse the passions and excite desires, it is no easy thing to perfect ourselves in every moral or religious excellence, to the exclusion of all that is vicious or unworthy. Hence, whatever can promote stability of principle, exalt the views, or refine the feelings, is of vital importance; and this certainly is the province of religious knowledge. From the disappointments of life, from the vexations of avarice or ambition, it transports the mind to a higher and better order of things. It opens the most glorious and abiding prospects, and presents a variety of subjects, in the investigation of which our time and talents might be profitably employed.

Religious knowledge comprises the abstract mysteries of Divinity, the being and attributes of God, his relation to us as a moral governor, our relation to him as intelligent and accountable creatures. It unfolds the most perfect theory of mind and matter, of providence and nature. It presents the most astonishing and overwhelming facts, unravels the most intricate mysteries, and explains a variety of important subjects. It embraces the most complete and rational system of moral duty, presenting those righteous laws to which we are amenable, and those divine principles which are so productive of human happiness. It is, in short, nothing less than the science of living right and well.

Sabbath Tracts.—In order to understand the worth of these little messengers, and the importance of circulating them freely, it is necessary to go into the field and begin the work. A brother who was present at the recent "Lord's Day Convention," and who assisted in distributing tracts, writes as follows in reference to the matter:—"I do sincerely wish that our people might know with what anxiety and eagerness the tracts were received and read; for, if so, the tract cause would flourish, and the country would be flooded with our publications. I believe the time has come when our churches might do much towards enlightening the Christian world on this great question. My intercourse with other denominations, and my conversations upon this subject, convince me more and more, that as a people we are not half awake. Can not something more be done for the tract cause?"

Consistency.—It is amusing to read the comments of the different papers upon the course of Mr. Lemmon and Mr. Magruder at the late "Lord's Day Convention." These gentlemen attended the convention by special invitation, and of course had a perfect right to express their opinions, and were bound to dissent from what they deemed to be wrong. When one of them did so, however, "he was interrupted by hisses and cries of order, whilst a number from the gallery cried, 'turn him out,' &c." Yet these men are charged with being ungentlemanly and disturbing the meeting, by the very persons who hissed, and stamped, and insulted them.

Again—one leading religious newspaper, speaking of Mr. Lemmon's assertion that he was a friend of the Lord's day but not of the Sabbath, says, then he had no business in the Convention, because it was called to promote the observance of the Sabbath. Yet this is the paper which thought Sabbath-keepers had no business in the Saratoga Convention, because it was called to promote the observance of the Lord's day.

Baptist Missions.—By a Circular recently issued, it appears that the Baptist Board of Foreign Missions is laboring under considerable embarrassment from the want of funds. Some persons who have been appointed are delayed from entering upon their work on this account. The calls for help are numerous, and the encouragements to labor many. Seventy-five churches, embracing nearly 7,000 communicants, are among the fruits of the Society's labors. In view of these things, the Board appeals to the churches for help.

Floating Chapels.—Two Floating Chapels for the accommodation of Seamen in New York, have been dedicated within a few months past—one by the Episcopalians and the other by the Methodists. The latter is the hull of an old ship, which has been ingeniously altered, so as to have a gallery, and seat about 700 persons. It is to be called "John Wesley." There are now several chapels for seamen in this port, all of which are said to be well attended, and to evince great improvement in the character of sailors.

Editorial Accessions.—Elizur Wright, Jr., whose interesting letters from Europe have gone the rounds for a few months past, has become connected with Joshua Leavitt as assistant editor of the Boston Morning Chronicle and Emancipator. Rev. George B. Cheever, who is at present in Europe, has been engaged as principal editor of the New York Evangelist, and is to give his exclusive attention to that paper immediately on his return.

The Gag-Rule Abolished.—By a reference to the Congressional Proceedings, it will be seen that the 25th Rule of the House, which rejected all petitions relating to slavery, has been rescinded. Every lover of freedom and humanity will rejoice in this triumph of right. May the future deliberations of the House meet the hopes which its beginning has awakened.

Postage Reform.—The Report of the Postmaster General admits that the rates of postage may safely be reduced. Of course, then, they ought to be; nobody can doubt that. And since the subject is now fairly before the people and their representatives, we may hope that something will be done during the present session of Congress. It is delightful to think of the improvements in social intercourse and intellectual culture, which the proposed change would certainly make. May these bright anticipations be realized.

ITEMS.

Mr. J. H. Green, the reformed gambler, is giving some striking illustrations of the frauds practiced among gamblers. Some gentlemen in Boston procured for him a new pack of cards; and the faces of 18 cards being at his request shown to one of the company, Mr. Green was able to select them all by merely looking at their backs, and he soon called the names of the whole 52 cards from seeing their backs alone. By such means do gamblers prey upon each other.

It is common, in China, to meet with traveling book-venders, dealing out their books and explaining their contents after the manner of modern colporteurs. A missionary makes this the ground of appeal for such labors in that country.

Several revivals of religion are reported in North Carolina, through the influence of which considerable numbers have joined the different churches.

A tract visitor in Cattaraugus county, N. Y., reports that 2,500 families have been visited within three months, of whom one sixth were destitute of all religious books except the Bible, and nearly two hundred had not even the Bible.

General Intelligence.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

By the steamship Caledonia, which reached Boston on Friday night last, we have papers to the 19th ult. The news is not especially important.

Hon. Joel W. White, newly appointed American Consul for the port of Liverpool, had arrived out.

There have been more severe gales in Liverpool, attended with unusual high tides. Several vessels were driven ashore, and met with other disasters. Incendiary fires continue to be frequent in different parts of the country. On the 10th ult. there was a heavy snow storm in England—the snow fell on Dartmoor to the depth of six inches.

The present spring tides have risen much higher than any for several years past, in consequence of which the Thames has overflowed its low-lying embankments above and below London-bridge, doing considerable damage to property situated along the waterside.

A lamentable accident occurred at Blackwall, on the Thames, produced by an explosion on board a steamer called the Gipsey Queen, a new iron vessel of 600 tons, and 300 horse power, by which seven persons lost their lives.

Mrs. Hofland, a lady to whom the younger portion of our society have been much indebted for amusement, instruction and beneficent advice, died lately at the age of 73.

The Rev. Wm. H. Henlowe, Curate of Wormegay, Norfolk, has been suspended from his functions for three months, for having refused to bury the corpse of a parishioner who had been baptized by a Methodist minister.

Mr. James Hogg, the only son of the Ettrick Shepherd, was to sail on Tuesday last, for India, seeking his fortune in the East, as the sons of Burns and the sons of Allen Cunningham have done before him. Mr. Hogg has been appointed to a situation in the Bank at Bombay. The only surviving son of Sir Walter Scott is now doing duty with his regiment at Madras.

Puseyism in the Church of England.—The Record, the organ of the Evangelical Church party, alluding to the secession of Mr. Newman from the church says, "we are now, in all probability, on the verge of a considerable secession from our venerable establishment. The fact we believe to be, that Mr. Newman would have gone over to Rome a year ago could he have carried Dr. Pusey with him. But Dr. Pusey was not ready, and his secession without Dr. Pusey would have had comparatively little effect. From the intelligence we have received, we think it probable that about thirty Masters of Arts in Oxford would accompany Mr Newman, if Dr Pusey secedes also; and we have heard it computed by those well qualified to form a just opinion of the case, that in Oxford, Cambridge, and even the country at large, there will be in all about a hundred of the Tractarians who will secede to their appropriate place within the bosom of Rome, if Mr. Newman were accompanied by Dr. Pusey.

Father Mathew.—A movement is now going on, and that it will prove successful there is little doubt, for not merely discharging his liabilities, but raising him a fund which will place him beyond pecuniary need hereafter. Meetings have been held in England, as well as in Ireland, on the subject, and, from the liberality of the subscriptions, the required sum—£20,000—will be speedily forthcoming. We find it stated that "a member of the Society of Friends, near New York, has sent £500 to the subscription in aid of Father Mathew, and the Duke of Devonshire has sent £100."

The rains have been so heavy recently, in some parts of Ireland, that the rivers have overflowed, and great damage has been done by floods. In Kilkenny, Tipperary, and other places, the devastation has been extensive, bridges having been swept away, houses flooded, and in some instances submerged, and roads rendered impassable.

The Reforme gives a painful account of the great prevalence of discontent in the manufacturing districts of France. The master cotton-spinners of Rouen, to the number of 300 or 400, have agreed to shorten the duration of the daily labor of their operatives one-third until March next—working them only four days instead of seven.

The Spanish papers are filled with details of the conspiracies alledged to have been discovered at Madrid and Barcelona, to murder Narvaez and others, and to overthrow the Government. Many persons have been arrested, and will probably be shot. Among them are several officers and noblemen of distinction.

Italy.—An unsuccessful attempt has been made to assassinate the Grand Duke of Tuscany. This country has been visited by destructive inundations. The Adige had been and the streets of Trent were overflowed. Agricultural implements, cattle, and furniture, strewed on the waters, attested the ruin inflicted in the country districts.

From Mexico.—Recent intelligence from Mexico is of a threatening character. Rumors have been rife to the effect that our Minister to Mexico, the Hon. Wilson Shannon, had demanded his passports, and was on his way home, and also that a serious revolution had broken out in Mexico, which had resulted in the overthrow of Santa Anna. There certainly was some foundation for this startling intelligence; but the news does not turn out as important as was at first reported, although still of a momentous nature.

It appears that a correspondence has been carried on between our minister and the minister of Mexico, in which each brings serious charges against the other—so serious that Mr. Shannon has temporarily suspended all his official relation with the Mexican Government. Disturbances had broken out in the State of Jalisco, under General Paredes, which threatened to be carried to extremes. This is about the amount of the difficulty. It may lead to very serious consequences.

U. S. Steam Frigate Missouri.—Capt. Townsend, of bark Douglass, just arrived from Gibraltar, states that a week previous to his sailing a S. W. gale had destroyed the works they had made to raise the steam frigate Missouri, that the bottom of the vessel had split, and that it was impossible to raise the wreck, or get anything more from her. The brig Cervantes returned to Gibraltar from Malaga in ballast, not being able to get fruit.

The city of London, which covers only 50 square miles, has more inhabitants than Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts and Rhode Island, which occupy 60,751 square miles.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

Tuesday, Dec. 3.

House of Representatives.—After the transaction of some unimportant business, Mr. John Quincy Adams, in pursuance of notice given yesterday, sent up the following resolution, written with his own trembling hand:

Resolved, That the 25th standing Rule, for conducting business in this House, in the words following: "No Petition, Memorial, Resolution, or other paper, praying the abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia, or any State or Territory, or the Slave Trade between the States or Territories of the United States, in which it now exists, shall be received by this House, or entertained in any way whatever;" be, and the same is hereby rescinded.

Mr. Jacob Thompson, of Mississippi, moved to lay this resolution on the table. The Yeas and Nays were ordered on the motion to lay on the table; Yeas 81, Nays 104.

Mr. Adams's resolution was then put, the yeas and nays being called, when there appeared for the resolution 108, against it 80.

So the 25th rule was rescinded, and the perseverance of the "old man eloquent" was crowned with success.

The President's Message, which had been brought into the House by John Tyler, Jr., the President's Private Secretary, during the disposal of Mr. Adams's resolution, was then read, and after some discussion, it was ordered that 10,000 copies of the Message and accompanying documents be printed. The Message was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the Union.

Notice was given of a motion for leave to introduce several bills, among which was one to amend the naturalization laws of the United States, and one to reduce and regulate the rates of postage. A motion to distribute $9,367,214 99, being the fourth instalment of the moneys in the Treasury from the proceeds of the sales of the Public Lands, was laid on the table.

Senate.—Little was done except to hear the President's Message.

Wednesday, Dec. 4.

House of Representatives.—Several notices of intended motions were given, including one to repeal the duty on cotton bagging and gunny cloth.

Mr. Duncan of Ohio introduced a bill appointing the first Tuesday of November, 1848, and the first Tuesday in November of every subsequent fourth year for the election of Presidential Electors throughout the States. After several propositions as to the disposal of the bill, it was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the Union, and made the order of the day for Monday.

Rev. W. M. Daily, of the Methodist church, was elected chaplain of the House.

In the Senate little else was done than to elect Rev. Septimus Tuston as chaplain.

Thursday, Dec. 5.

In the House several unimportant motions were passed, when it adjourned to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock.

The Senate was in session but a few minutes, and adjourned to Monday.

Monday, Dec. 9.

House of Representatives.—Several members appeared for the first time. A committee to superintend expenditures of the Library was appointed.

The House went into a committee of the whole on the bill providing for a uniform day of electing President. After considerable discussion, it was postponed to take up the President's Message, which was referred to appropriate committees.

The Speaker announced the Standing Committees, and the House adjourned.

In the Senate, after the presentation of credentials by new members, the Standing Committees were appointed, which are nearly the same as they stood last session.

Several unimportant bills were presented; and the new Constitution of Iowa Territory, which was referred.

Mr. Rives submitted a resolution calling upon the President for the latest correspondence between the Ministers of the U. S. and Mexico. Adjourned

Conviction for Murder.—The trial of William Miller, which has been in progress before the Circuit Court at Troy for some days past, on the charge of murdering George West more than two years ago, in the town of Sandlake, Rensselaer county, was terminated on Tuesday. The evidence, though wholly circumstantial, seems to have been conclusive, and the jury, after being out a few hours, brought in a verdict of guilty. On Wednesday morning, Judge Parker pronounced sentence of death upon the prisoner, assuring him there was no hope of a pardon. The 28th day of January is the day fixed for Miller's execution. [Alb. Death of Hon. Wm. Prescott.—It is with deep regret that we learn that Hon. William Prescott died at his residence in this city on Sunday morning. He was apparently in his usual health, at breakfast; but soon after complained of oppression in the region of the heart, and fell instantly dead. He was a graduate in the class of 1783, (Harvard) and we presume was about 80 years of age. Judge Prescott has filled many public offices with distinguished honor to himself and advantage to the people, and was a lawyer of profound erudition. He retained his mental and physical powers unimpaired to the last. His father was the commander of the American troops at the battle of Bunker Hill, and his son the historian of Ferdinand and Isabella.

Overworked Chancellors.—Thurlow, on being asked how he got through all his business as a Chancellor, answered, "Just as a pickpocket gets through a horsepond—he must get through." Dunning, when a similar question was put to him, answered in much the same spirit, though in a more professional style: "I divide my business into three parts; one part I do, another does itself, and the third goes undone."

Fire and Loss of Life.—On Wednesday afternoon last, the Cumberland Valley Railroad Bridge across the Susquehanna (Harrisburgh, Pa.) was discovered to be on fire. The fire started about half way between the opposite shore and the island, which is about the middle of the river. There was a pretty brisk wind from the north-east, and in about 15 minutes a part of the bridge to the opposite shore was entirely consumed, together with a small house on the shore.

A span of the bridge by which had been part, cut away to arrest the fire, and on which the hose companies were stationed, unexpectedly fell, carrying with it some fifty or sixty persons, crushing several between the timbers and mangling their bodies horribly.

This bridge was one of the most splendid pieces of architecture in the country. The Railroad cars ran over the top, and beneath was a carriage way and foot path. It was something over a mile long, and cost about 130,000 dollars.

A Ship at Zero.—The Madisonian contains a letter from M. C. Perry, of the U. S. Frigate Macedonian, which states that on the evening of the 4th of July last, that vessel arrived at the point in the Atlantic ocean where the meridian of Greenwich crosses the Equator, and where, of course, latitude and longitude are both reduced to nothing. At this grand starting point, the Macedonian fired thirteen guns, in honor of the old thirteen States.

Apple Trees.—A horticulturist in Bohemia has a fine plantation of the best apple trees, which have neither sprung from seed nor grafting. His plan is, to take shoots from the choicest sorts, insert them in a potatoe, and plunge them into the ground, having put an inch or two of the shoot above the surface. The potatoe nourishes the shoot whilst it pushes out roots, and the shoot gradually springs up and becomes a beautiful tree, bearing the best fruit, without requiring to be grafted.

Capt. Jonathan Walker.—We find by the Boston Chronicle, that Jonathan Walker, who it will be remembered was arranged on Friday, charged with abducting slaves, has been convicted of "slave stealing," and sentenced to be branded with the letters "S S." in his right hand, sit in the pillory one hour, be imprisoned fifteen days, and pay a fine of $150. The first two clauses of the sentence were carried into effect, and while he was sitting in the pillory, we understand that one of the slaveholders, whose slaves took passage in Capt. Walker's vessel, tore from his face the handkerchief put over it by the sheriff, and pelted it with rotten eggs! Capt. Walker has been assailed with civil actions for damages, (laid at $100,000,) by the owners of the fugitives who took refuge in his vessel.

Isaac Dean.—This Abolition agent, a negro, has been committed to jail, in default of bail in the sum of $5000. He is believed to be the instrument of Abolitionists in this section, furnishing forged passes and all the information necessary for getting them off. [St. Louis Reville.

SUMMARY.

The arge cotton factory at Roseville, near Newark, (Del.,) was burnt to the ground on Saturday night last. It is said that a boy who had gone into the factory took a piece of cotton to light a candle, and afterward threw it on the floor, intending to extinguish the fire with his foot; but unfortunately, the cotton that was strewn about the floor ignited, and the fire soon spread all over the building. The loss is estimated at $40,000, while he insurance was only $20,000.

NOTICE.

The Seventh-day Baptist Central Association will hold its semi-annual meeting, with the 3d Church in Brookfield, commencing on the fourth day before the second Sabbath in January next. A full representation from all the churches of the Association is anxiously desired.

G. M. Langworthy, Rec. Sec.

The brethren are probably aware. that the object of this meeting is purely missionary. By the arrangements of the last Association, missionaries were appointed to labor in different places, to which some of them have addressed themselves with considerable success. No arrangements are made for recompensing such laborers, except what the churches voluntarily contribute to this object. Brethren, we wish you to come to this meeting for two objects:—1st. To hear the report of your missionaries, that your hearts may be enlisted more deeply in the glorious cause of missions. 2d. That you may contribute of the substance which God has given you, to forward the cause, by sustaining those who devote themselves to the labor of preaching the Gospel, and such portions of it as are peculiar to our own denomination, to those who are in darkness or in error on these important truths.

DAY OF FASTING AND PRAYER.

It will be remembered, that at the last meeting of the General Conference, a day of fasting and prayer was recommended, to be held on the first day of the week after the first Sabbath in January, being the 5th day of the month. It is hoped that the churches will make timely arrangements for a general and profitable observance of the day. The following are the resolutions of the Conference:—

Resolved, That inasmuch as the first day of November, 1843, was observed, in accordance with the recommendation of this General Conference, as a day of humiliation before God, and earnest entreaty to Him to arise and plead for his holy Sabbath, since which time a deeper and wider-spread interest upon the subject has sprung up, than has ever been before known in this country; therefore, Resolved, That the 1st first day of the week in January next, be observed as a day of fasting, devout acknowledgment for blessings bestowed, and earnest prayer that God would continue to plead for his holy Sabbath, and also prepare us by his Holy Spirit for the labor thus devolved upon us.

Resolved, That we invite all who love the Sabbath, and desire its better observance, to unite with us in presenting its interests at the throne of grace.

THE MOTHERLESS.

You're weary, precious ones! your eyes
Are wandering far and wide;
Think ye of her who knew so well
Your tender thoughts to guide;
Who could to wisdom's sacred lore
Your fixed attention claim?
Ah! never from your hearts erase
That blessed mother's name.

'Tis time to say your evening hymn,
My youngest infant dove!
Come press thy velvet cheek to mine,
And learn the lay of love;
My sheltering arms can clasp you all,
My poor deserted throng!
Cling as you used to cling to her
Who sings the angel song.

Begin, sweet birds! the accustomed strain,
Come warble loud and clear;
Alas! alas! you're weeping all,
You're sobbing in my ear.
Good night!—Go say the prayers she taught
Beside your little bed—
The lips that used to bless you there
Are silent with the dead!

A father's hand your course may guide,
Amid the thorns of life;
His care protect these shrinking plants
That dread the storm of strife;
But who upon your infant hearts
Shall like that mother write!
Who touch the strings that rule the soul!
Dear smitten flock, Good night.

JEWISH STATESMEN AND WARRIORS.

"The fact is, you cannot destroy a pure race of the Caucasian organization. It is a physiological fact; a simple law of nature, which has baffled Egyptian and Assyrian Kings, Roman Emperors, and Christian Inquisitors. No penal laws, no physical tortures, can effect that a superior race should be absorbed in an inferior or be destroyed by it. The mixed persecuting races disappear, the pure persecuted race remains. And, at this moment, in spite of centuries, or tens of centuries of degradation, the Jewish mind exercises a vast influence on the affairs of Europe. I speak not of their laws, which you still obey; of their literature, with which your minds are saturated, but of the living Hebrew intellect. You never observe a great intellectual movement in Europe, in which the Jews do not greatly participate. The first Jesuits were Jews; that mysterious Russian diplomacy which so alarms western Europe, is organized and principally carried on by Jews; that mighty revolution which is at this moment preparing in Germany, which will be in fact a second and greater Reformation, and of which so little is as yet known in England, is entirely developing itself under the auspices of Jews, who almost monopolize the chairs of Germany. Neander, the founder of spiritual Christianity, and who is regius professor of divinity in the University of Berlin, is a Jew. Brenary, equally famous, and in the same University, is a Jew. Wehl, the Arabic professor of Heidelberg, is a Jew. Years ago, when I was in Palestine, I met a German student who was accumulating materials for the history of Christianity; and studying the genius of the place; a modest and learned man. It was Wehl, the unknown, since become the first Arabic scholar of the day, and the author of the life of Mahomet. But for the German professors of this race their name is Legion. I think there are more than ten in Berlin alone.

* * * * * *

I resolved to go to St. Petersburgh. I had on my arrival an interview with the Russian Minister of Finance, Count Cancrim: I beheld the son of a Lithuanian Jew. Repairing to Spain, I had an audience with the Minister, Senor Mendizabel: I beheld one like myself, the son of a Nuovo Christiano, a Jew of Arragon. In consequence of what transpired at Madrid, I went straight to Paris, to consult the President of the French Council: I beheld the son of a French Jew, a hero, an imperial marshal, and very properly so, for who should be military heroes if not those who worship the Lord of Hosts."

And is Soult a Hebrew?

"Yes; and several of the French marshals, and the most famous Massena, for example; his real name was Mannasseh; but to my anecdote.

"The consequence of our consultation was, that some northern power should be applied to in a friendly and mediative capacity. We fixed on Prussia, and the President of the Council made an application to the Prussian Minister, who attended a few days after our conference. Count Armin entered the Cabinet, and I beheld a Prussian Jew. So you see, my dear Conningsby, that the world is governed by different personages to what is imagined by those who are not behind the scenes."

You startle and deeply interest me.

"You must study physiology, my dear child. Pure races of Caucasus may be persecuted, but they cannot be despised, except by the brutal ignorance of some mongrel breed that brandishes fagots and howls exterminations, but is itself exterminated without persecutions, by that irresistible law of nature which is fatal to ours." [D'Israeli.

PECULIARITIES OF LITERARY MEN.

Johnson used to bite his nails to the quick, an intimation of his dogmatism and crustiness.

Addison was remarkable for the irregularity of his pulse, but his heart was believed to be in the right place and of proper dimensions.

Pope was of a frame so feeble that he was accustomed to brace himself up with stays padded with cotton. He occasionally found time to lace his enemies.

Ben Johnson used to sit silent in learned company, "and suck in," as Fuller says, "not only his wine but their several humors." Like Shakspear, he held the mirror up to nature, but chose sometimes to look into the glass himself.

Rousseau used to knit lace strings when in a company of illiterate people, for the purpose of concealing the uneasiness which their gabble gave him. He preferred his lace strings to their long yarns.

Cowley boasted with much gaiety of the versatility of his passion among many mistresses, but wanted even the confidence to address one. To his tender fair ones, he made no tender.

Steele constantly preached economy to others, but forgot to practice it himself. He was always in debt, and once pulled the nose of an acquaintance who hesitated to lend him a large sum of money. Certainly a sure way of obtaining a draft.

Bloomfield wrote most of his poem, "Farmer Boy," with chalk upon the top of a pair of bellows—a wind instrument until this time probably unknown to the choir of Muses.

A letter, without date or signature, was recently received by the American Tract Society, enclosing $100, with the simple words, "For sending colporteurs to the West."

JEWISH INTELLIGENCE.

From the Voice of Israel.

Die Auferstehung—The Revival—is the title of a weekly journal commenced last January at Frankfort on the Maine, under the editorship of Mr. Herman Stern. That which renders Mr. Stern and his journal most interesting to the Christian, is, his bold and decided advocacy of the doctrine of the Trinity; which he says can be amply proved from the Jewish Scriptures, and also from the Talmud. The following abridged account of the origin of the Auferstehung, will interest our readers.

The regulation of the political and ecclesiastical standing of the Jews in Bavaria having occupied the attention of the King, arrangements were made in each province of the kingdom for an assembly of Jewish Rabbis and deputies, at which a government commissioner should preside. The meeting in the province of Wurtzburg, at which Mr. Stern was present, took place in January, 1838. The two following questions were put to the meeting on the part of the government:—1st. Whether writing may be permitted on the Sabbath? 2d. Whether the Jews receive or reject the doctrine of the Trinity as contained in the Pentateuch? To the first question the Rabbis answered in the negative; to the second they replied, that the doctrine of the Trinity not being contained in the Old Testament, the Jews do not acknowledge it. From both these decisions Mr. Stern dissented; and published his reasons for so doing. This brought on him a series of persecutions from his brethren, who represented him as holding heretical views; and by persevering efforts, they at length got him deposed from his office of teacher in a Jewish theological school. He then removed to Frankfort, where, as we have already stated, he commenced the publication of the Auferstehung; which he states to be the result of diligent research and meditation; not with the view of widening, but of healing the breach between Judaism and Christianity.

Curious Legal Evidence.—At a recent trial at the assizes of the Lower Rhine, for the murder of a Jew and his wife, named Levy, the following curious evidence was brought forward to prove the time at which the crime was committed. A witness testified that the woman Levy salted some meat in his presence about nine o'clock in the evening. The Jews do not allow their meat to remain in salt more than an hour; as this meat was found in salt next morning, when the murder was discovered, the crime must therefore have been perpetrated between nine and ten o'clock.

The above is taken from the Archives Israelites. To make it better understood by our Christian readers, we will state that to prevent the possibility of eating blood, the Rabbins command that all fresh meat shall be covered with salt, in order to draw out the blood that may remain in it. It was this process the meat referred to was undergoing; not that of curing, or preparing to be eaten salt.

THE HOUSEKEEPER.

From the "Housekeeper's Annual" for 1845.

To make Yeast.—Boil for half an hour two quarts of water, thickened with about three spoonfuls of fine flour, and sweetened with nearly half a pound of brown sugar, or two teacups of molasses. When almost cold, put it into a jug adding four spoonfuls of fresh yeast. Shake it well together, let it stand uncovered near the fire for a day to ferment. There will be a thin liquor on the top, pour this off, shake the remainder, and cork it up for use. To make half a peck of flour into bread, a quarter of a pint of the above mixture will be needed.

Soft Custards.—Boil one quart of new milk and with it cinnamon, mace, or lemon peel. Nine eggs, leaving out five whites, beat them well and add them to the milk, sweeten it with loaf sugar; Add rose water if you like. Put the custard into a pitcher, place it in a vessel of boiling water, stir it constantly. Beat the reserved whites to a stiff froth with powdered sugar, add a little rose water, or essence of lemon. Lay this frost on the top of of the custards. The contrast is pretty, and more cups may be filled.

Pennsylvania Apple Butter.—To make this according to German law, the host should, in the Autumn, invite his neighbors, particularly the young men and maidens, to make up an apple butter party. Being assembled, let three bushels of fair sweet apples be pared, quartered, and the cores removed. Meanwhile let two barrels of new cider be boiled down to one-half. When this is done, commit the prepared apples to the cider, and let the boiling go on briskly and systematically. But to accomplish the main design, the party must take turns at stirring the contents without cessation so that they may not become attached to the sides of the vessel and burn. Let the stirring go on till the amalgamated cider and apples become as thick as hasty pudding, then throw in powdered allspice, when it may be considered as finished and committed to the pots for further use. This is Apple Butter; and it will keep sweet for many years. It is a capital article for the table.

Thanksgiving.—Were we not, as a Quaker should be, opposed to all "fasts and feasts, and vain oblations," we might even thank the old Puritans—or rather the wild Indians for it—for they, too, had their corn-dance and autumn feast, of which ours seems to be a sort of Yankee imitation—and expressed their gratitude to the All-Merciful Giver, probably quite as rationally as we do with gastronimic experiments upon turkies and plum-puddings.

The gathering of long-separated friends and relatives on this day, brightening anew the rusted and time-worn links of affection, bringing around the old family table, and beside the well-remembered hearth, every brick of which has its familiar history, those > "Who grew in beauty side by side,

> And filled one home with glee"—

the brother, a thought-worn man, with the frost-marks of time on the dark locks of his boyhood—greeting the sister, no longer the sweet girl who smiled through her tears at their parting long before, but a sadly-sober mother, with the anxious and care-worn look of maternity—and both seeking anew the blessing of their father, leaning on his staff, and of their mother, whose dim eyes can scarcely discern her children, yet whose heart is still a mother's—all this is well—nay, it is beautiful and holy. For this we welcome the old Festival. It is one of the bright tints in the somewhat too gloomy picture of Puritan life—a gleam of natural sunshine streaming through "darkness which may be felt." [J. G. Whittier.

In Manchester, England, it is said that the Greeks have become so numerous, that some of the more wealthy of the sect have made arrangements to erect a place for worship according to the forms of the Greek Church.

Cherokee Insolvent Laws.—"A New Way to Pay Old Debts."—Mr Gregg, the author of the very interesting book upon the "Commerce of the Prairies," mentions the prevalence of a custom among the Cherokee Indians, which subserves all the purposes of a bankrupt law. When a trader of that nation falls behind hand in his affairs, he is brought before a tribunal, having many of the properties and functions of Judge Lynch's Court, which decides whether the circumstances of the party are so desperate as to require the intervention of the bankrupt code. If the cause is determined in the affirmative, the bankrupt is stripped and tied to a tree, when each creditor, with a good cowhide or hickory switch, scores the amount of his dues upon the victim's bare back—laying on a stripe for each dollar of his debt. While the process is going on, the most quaint and ludicrous remarks are made by the bystanders to enliven the scene—which is deemed a most entertaining and instructive pastime to all save the victim of this barbarous law. When the flagellation is gone through with, the debts of the party are considered as paid off, and such is the veneration in which the rights acquired by passing through this bloody ordeal are held by the tribe, that not a single cent would be received in discharge of an account thus balanced, were the insolvent thereafter to become rich and offer to pay in money.

Right of Suffrage in Paraguay.—When Dr. Francia was elevated to the office of Chief Magistrate of Paraguay, a Council of State, with whom he was to advise, was also established, to consist of seven persons, to be chosen by Electors. The Electors were to be chosen in the parishes, by married men, widowers and widows—unmarried men, or married women, or women who had never been married, not being allowed to vote! Francia never entertained a very elevated idea of old bachelors.

Glass Bottle Factory.—There is now in operation at Pittsburgh, a black Glass Bottle manufactory, owned by a Mr. C. Ihmsen, which supplies all the market in the West and South with wine and porter bottles, demijohns, acid jars, flasks, &c. Orders for wine and porter bottles are frequently filled, it is stated, for Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and other markets eastward. The demijohns are of 6, 5, 4, 1 and ½ gallon capacity, and are covered with basket work of willow, at the factory, by girls belonging to the families of the blowers. The willow is brought from Germany in large bundles, which cost $1 25 each in the East.

Business in Cairo.—Wheat is ground in Cairo in small mills, worked by buffaloes or oxen. The business of the baker is somewhat different from the same calling with us. The loaves are usually made ready by the customers, and brought at stated hours once or twice in the same day, to the baker, who places them in his oven, which is always kept heated, and in a few minutes returns them sufficiently baked, for which he receives a small sum. I had to advance money to the baker to purchase flour, as he would not incur such a risk himself, and also to pay in part in advance of his labor. I inquired why he was so cautious, as he would have the bread for his security till he should receive his pay. His reply was, that he wanted money, and not bread, and that I might only intend to make a fool of him. I found this to be the usual practice with tradesmen, who will not do work to the amount of a few piasters without receiving a part of the pay in advance. I sent my boots by my servant to the shoemaker's to be repaired; he soon returned, and asked for three or four piasters, without which the man refused to undertake them.

The Adventures of a Letter.—A late number of the Sheffield, Eng., Independent, received by the last steamer, states that a letter from Valparaiso was recently received by a mercantile house in Sheffield, bearing the Nova Scotia postmark, having been opened, released, and endorsed 'opened by the crew of the Saladin.' It will be remembered that a portion of the crew of this vessel mutinied, and took possesion of the ship, but steering to Nova Scotia, they were taken and brought to justice. The letter having been opened but not destroyed, was posted by the authorities, in Nova Scotia, and at length has reached its destination.

America in 1788.—Dr. Price, an English divine, in a fast sermon, preached February 10th, 1788, draws the following character of this country: "There is a distant country once united to this, where every inhabitant has in his house, as a part of his furniture, a book on law and government, to enable him to understand his colonial rights—a musket to defend those rights, and a Bible to understand and practice religion. What can hurt such a people? Is it any wonder we have not succeeded? How secure it must be while it preserves its virtue against all attacks!"

A Good Rebuke.—Abon Honifah, chief of the Turkish sect, once received a blow in the face from a ruffian, and rebuked him in these terms, not unworthy of Christian imitation: "If I were vindictive, I should return you outrage for outrage; if I were an informer, I should accuse you before the caliph; but I prefer putting up a prayer to God, that, in the day of judgment, he will cause me to enter into heaven with you."

Lawyers in China.—No attornies are authorized by law in China; those self-constituted are thus defined and described by a Chinese classic writer:—"Villainous and perverse vagabonds, who are fond of making a stir, and who, either by fradulent and crafty schemes, excite discord; or by disorderly and illegal proceedings, intimidate and impose upon people."

Safe Mode of Blasting.—It is known by many individuals, though not to the public generally, that rocks may be blasted without ramming down pounded brick on the charge. Put a rye straw into the hole; if one be not long enough, use two, running the top of one into the other, tying paper around the joint. Then put in the charge of powder and prime the straw, and then fill up the hole with fine dry sand, without ramming. Nothing more is necessary preparatory to touching the match. [Boston Cultivator.

Two men named Fields, with their two sons, residing in the North part of the Cherokee nation, went to their field for the purpose of putting out a fire on the Prairie. The wind blowing very violently, the flames advanced with such speed, they were obliged to run for their lives, and three of them perished in the flames. [Cherokee Adv.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

This Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. Kenyon, as Principal, and Miss Caroline B. Maxson, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

Tuition, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

MINISTERING SPIRITS.

What are they, then, these ministers of love,
That come to us in hours of bitter need,
Brooding above the deluge of our woes,
With olive-boughs of peace? Whose whisper stills
The tempest of the soul, when storm and cloud
Have gathered o'er it? Who with unseen hand,
Pours heavenly cordial on the drooping head,
And draws the fainting spirit fearless on Through faith's stern ordeal? Whose ethereal touch
Smooths the dark passage, and conducts the soul
To its inheritance?

And are they, then,
The unfallen, unredeemed, the ever pure,
With wings unsullied by the breath of time,
Who hover o'er us? A deep voice within Questions—yet meekly—Can it be that they
Whose lips ne'er prest Earth's bitter cup of life,
Whose weary forms ne'er bent beneath the load
Of human ills, or trod the thorny way,
Can fitly serve salvation's future heirs?
O, if their Captain, for the sufferers' sake,
Assumed that nature, whose harsh discipline
Wrought his perfection; if the tempted claim
His succor, who was tempted for their sake,—
Can the untried, untempted, unrestored,
Who keep their first estate, be wise to weave
The varied tissue of a mortal life
With warnings, and reproofs, and kindly smiles,
And sweet encouragements, and heavenward hopes—
With skill unerring, yet abstractly gained?
And the heart answers—Rather trust that ye,
Who come not trembling to the awful base
Of Sinai's burning mount, but humbly bow
At Zion's hill, meet there your parted ones,
The just made perfect; they whose kindred hearts
Ye sigh for in the flesh, who having striven,
And with strong wrestlings gained the mastery
O'er inbred evils—faithful in the least—
Have won the appointment to a higher trust,
A holier mission.

If the Blessed One,
In the dark hour of conflict, was sustain'd
By love's sweet messengers, oh, let us pray
They leave us never. If the exiled one,
The loved disciple on lone Patmos' isle,
Needed stern counsel, lest his surcharged heart
Broke forth in creature worship, be it ours,
Who share unseen the heaven-appointed care,
To cast our arm of prayer around the throne,
In deepest adoration of that love
That has not left us comfortless, but with
The Holy Spirit gives us to enjoy
This blessed ministry.

TIME OF COMMENCING THE SABBATH.

I noticed in the 14th number of the Recorder, over the signature of "FAGANUS," some strictures on the report of a committee appointed by Conference respecting the time of commencing the Sabbath; and inasmuch as I consider it a very great misfortune to the cause of truth, that the brethren of our connection differ so widely in practice on the very subject which distinguishes us from all other Christian denominations, and having seen no reply to that article, it appeared to me improper that the investigation should stop here.

Faganus says there is a discrepancy observable on the very face of the committee's argument. But it really appeared to me, that there was more sophistry on his part than discrepancy on theirs. To show the inconsistency of their arguments, he says, "If the words 'evening and morning,' used in the first chapter of Genesis, were designed to include the whole of the darkness, and the whole of the light part of each day, then, comparing that with Lev. 23: 32, 'From even to even shall ye celebrate your Sabbath,' it would appear that the light part only of the day was set apart for the Sabbath," because the words from evening, he thinks, must necessarily mean from the last end of the darkness. Now, if he had just turned to the third verse of the next chapter, he might have seen, that the expression "from evening" signifies from the beginning of the night, and not from the last end of it. Thus we see, that instead of its being a discrepancy in the arguments of the committee, it was only a want in himself of a better understanding of the Bible; for the word evening in the Bible, is uniformly used to signify the close of the day, or commencement of night; and so in our English writers. Joshua 10: 26, 27, shows exactly what is to be understood by evening. It is there said, that he hung five kings on five trees, and they were hanging on the trees till evening; and when the sun did set, he commanded and they took them down, &c. We see not only from this, but likewise from many other passages, as well as from all our lexicographers, that it is evening when the sun sets, and not when it rises; consequently, when it was said, "from even to even shall ye celebrate your Sabbath," it was just as much as to say, from sunset to sunset shall ye celebrate your Sabbath, or from the close of one day to the close of the next day.

Again—it is made equally plain in the New Testament. When Christ healed the sick on the Sabbath day, the rulers of the synagogue found fault, and said to the people, "There are six days in which men ought to work; in them, therefore, come and be healed, and not on the Sabbath day." Luke 13: 14. And when Jesus came out of the synagogue, where he had been teaching on the Sabbath day, and had healed Simon's wife's mother, the people, for fear of the Jews or from their own convictions, would not bring their sick to be healed until the Sabbath was past, as may be seen from Mark 1: 32; and at even, when the sun did set, they brought unto him all, that were diseased, &c. If this does not clearly and conclusively prove that the Sabbath, in the days of our Saviour, ended at sunset, I confess I should utterly despair of proving any thing by the Bible, so as not to be evaded by sophistry. And inasmuch as it is a clear point, that the Sabbath ends at sunset, unless it can be made out that the seventh day of the week differs in its length and construction from all the other six, it must be admitted that it begins at sunset; for God sanctified the seventh day, not a part of it. It was a whole day, and in its length and natural construction exactly like the other six.

Faganus freely and consistently admits, that before the formation of the sun, moon and stars, there was in some way unknown to us, a regular succession of light and darkness, that measured out the first day; and how he should conceive that the light part of the first day preceded the dark part of the same; or, in other words, that there was a morning before there was an evening, is to me utterly unaccountable, unless it may be admitted that habit and prepossession will enable a man to conceive what is diametrically opposite to common sense; for every man must know, that before there was light on this earth, it certainly was dark; and when God said, Let there be light, then there was light, and not before. Consequently, when this earth was first brought into existence, and darkness was on the face of the deep, the beginning of that darkness on the earth must have been its first evening; how then, I ask, can any man read the first three verses in the Bible, and not believe there was a morning before there was an evening? Now, although as a general thing and almost an exclusive one, the words evening and morning are used to denote the beginning of night and the beginning of day, yet it must necessarily be admitted, that the use made of them in the first chapter of Genesis is an exception to the general rule, and must there be understood to include the whole of the dark part and the whole of the light part of each day, unless we can persuade ourselves that the mere beginning of night, and the mere beginning of day, comprehends the whole day, which is absurd. Hence it must be admitted, that the report of the committee in that respect was correct; and if Faganus thinks otherwise, I should be much gratified to hear him tell how much of the darkness, and how much light, not including the whole, he thinks it took to make a whole day. Much of our Bible would be to us utterly void of meaning; but for the application to it of reason and common sense. The same words do not in every case mean exactly the same thing, but by the knowledge and consideration of certain facts connected with the subject, we ascertain their meaning; and such are the facts connected with this subject in the first chapter of Genesis, that there is no possibility within the bounds of reason of construing it otherwise than as the committee has done.

Now let us come to the case of Nehemiah. Faganus thinks there is no difficulty at all in construing the conduct of Nehemiah in this matter, without supposing that he thought the Sabbath began at sunset. Well, supposing he could do all that, what would that do towards proving that Nehemiah did not think the Sabbath began at sunset? Why, surely, just nothing at all. But to make the best he can of a bad case, Faganus goes on to tell us that Nehemiah well knew that it was the custom of those traders to bring in their loads in the evening, so that they might be ready for selling very early in the morning, as is the custom now in our great cities; hence it would be a point of prudence to have the gates shut early in the evening. Well, what of that? There is no doubt that Nehemiah well knew that the danger consisted in letting them enter in the evening, for in the day time he could drive them from the walls by his own personal authority. He was not at all concerned, it seems, about their getting in by day. We should take notice, that Nehemiah was so determined in his purpose, that he was not satisfied with merely having the gates shut, but some of his servants sat he at the gates, that no burden should be brought in on the Sabbath. What! in the evening on the Sabbath? Yes, certainly. Nehemiah was not afraid of their getting in during the day time; but it was in the evening on the Sabbath day, that he was so careful about. Here, then, is another strong evidence that the Sabbath commences at sunset. But Faganus, in order to make it appear that the previous evening does not belong to the Sabbath, puts great stress on the circumstance of the gates being shut in the evening before the Sabbath. But we must take notice that he did not order the gates to be shut in the evening, but they were to be shut when they began to be dark. Now let me ask, where is the man that does not know, that in such a high walled city as Jerusalem was, and surrounded too with high and lofty mountains, the gates would begin to be dark a considerable time before sunset—time enough at least to have them shut before the Sabbath, although it commenced at sunset. Thus it appears that Faganus has got nothing out of this circumstance, at last, that he can hold on to.

Finally, brother Faganus wisely concludes not to rest his belief on such flimsy arguments as all these, since he thinks he has plain Scripture testimony to the very point. Now, if he should fail this time, I know not what he would do. He first quotes Matthew 28: 1, "In the end of the Sabbath, as it began to dawn towards the first day of the week." This, he thinks, is direct to the point; and he says that Mark, Luke, and John, all say the same thing, with only some little variation in wording it, which only goes to strengthen their testimony. I must confess, that there is something very extraordinary in this, that he should think that Mark, Luke, and John, all agree that it was in the end of the Sabbath, while every one of them declare it was on the first day of the week. How such a discrepancy between Matthew and the other three is to be reconciled, is a question not so very easily solved. I have been credibly informed, that the translators of our Bible were so puzzled with it, that some of them were ready to think that the Marys actually went twice; once in the end of the Sabbath, when they could not get in for the watch, and again in the morning. But how the case really was, remains rather mysterious. There is nothing in the three accounts given by Mark, Luke, and John, that would weigh in the least degree against the position, that the Sabbath begins and ends at sunset; and surely at the mouth of three witnesses every word should be established. They all, according to our version, say it was on the first day of the week, and John says it was while it was yet dark—which is decidedly in favor of the position that the previous night belongs to the day following; for if it was the first day of the week while it was yet dark, certainly so much of the night or darkness belonged to that day; and if so much, why not all the rest? Thus we see that the last three evangelists compared together, favor the position that the previous night belongs to the day; so that Faganus has nothing left to hang to in these four accounts, except that vague expression used by St. Matthew, "In the end of the Sabbath, as it began to dawn towards the first day of the week." I call it vague; for if it was in the end, middle, or any other part of the Sabbath, it could not have been on the first day of the week, as all the other three declare, unless the first day of the week is the Sabbath, and that I suppose Faganus would hardly be willing to admit; and even if he did that, it would not seem to come quite right after all. Upon the whole, I think Faganus had better give the matter up, seeing his plain Scripture turns out to be so extremely vague and uncertain. In fact, I see no other way of reconciling Matthew's account with the other three, than by supposing the Marys went twice to the sepulchre as above stated, or that the evangelists were not at all particular about stating the exact time, not thinking that any such inference would ever be drawn from it as Faganus has attempted to draw.

But there is one more passage to be considered, on which I suppose Faganus placed his chief dependence. It is John 20: 19, "The same day at evening, being the first day of the week," &c. We must first take notice, that this text does not say it was in the evening, but at evening. It is well known, that the preposition at does not always signify in. I might be at your house, and not be in it. You might be at the river, and not so much as wet your feet. So likewise a thing might be done at evening, and yet be done before sunset. And now, if it can be fairly and positively proved, that the Sabbath begins and ends at sunset, which I think I have sufficiently done already, then if this text proves any thing in the case, it would only prove that the disciples met that day before sunset, on the first day of the week, at or near evening, and not in the evening. This is all it would prove; and it is altogether likely that they did meet before sunset, although they might have remained together all night.

And now, if you are not satisfied with Scripture proof, which I have already adduced, I will try another method, and bring living testimony. No man, I presume, will doubt that when God gave the law of the Sabbath to the Israelites, he meant for them to understand when it began and when it ended; otherwise they could not have known what the Sabbath was. And if he meant for them to understand it, there can be no doubt that they did understand it. As they understood it then, just so they have always by tradition kept it ever since. However much they may have corrupted themselves in other things, they never lost sight of the Sabbath. In the days of their greatest wickedness they were extremely tenacious and particular about the Sabbath day. Now if any man wishes to know when the Sabbath begins and ends, he has only to find out how the Jews keep it, and if he keeps it as they do, as it respects the time when it begins and ends, he may rest satisfied that he is keeping it as God intended it should be kept, and that is, "from even unto even shall ye celebrate your Sabbath," or from sunset to sunset; for at even, when the sun did set, they brought unto him all that were diseased. Mark 1: 31. There is no doubt that the people would have preferred to have brought their sick to be healed before sunset, had it not been for some scruples they had about bringing them on the Sabbath; but as soon as the sun did set, they felt themselves at full liberty, for the Sabbath was then ended. And there is not the least probability that it would ever have entered into the mind of man to keep the evening after the Sabbath as a part of it, if it had not been for that little horn that thought to "change times and laws." If there are any now living, who carry the least traces of the mark of the beast about them, I advise them by all means to wash it away as soon as possible.

A MOTHER'S FAITH AND LOVE.

At length, on the third day, when the bloody procession was over, Leclerc was made to stop at the usual place of execution. The executioner prepared the fire, heated the iron which was to sear the flesh of the minister of the gospel, and approaching him, branded him as a heretic on his forehead. Just then a shriek was uttered—but it came not from the martyr. His mother, a witness of the dreadful sight, wrung with anguish, endured a violent struggle between the enthusiasm of faith and maternal feelings; but her faith overcame, and she exclaimed in a voice that made the adversaries tremble, "Glory be to Jesus Christ and his witnesses." Thus did this French woman of the 16th century, have respect to the word of the Son of God—"Whosoever loveth his son more than me, is not worthy of me." So daring a courage at such a moment might have seemed to demand instant punishment; but that Christian mother had struck powerless the hearts of priests and soldiers. Their fury was restrained by a mightier arm than theirs. The crowd falling back and making way for her, allowed the mother to regain, with faltering steps, her humble dwelling. Monks, and even the town sergeants themselves, gazed on her without moving; "not one of her enemies," says Theodore Beza, "dared put forth his hand against her." [D'Aubigne.

THE GENERAL CONFERENCE.

We find the following notice of the last General Conference in the December number of the Occident. We transfer it to our columns, because it shows how our cause is regarded by a leading member of the Jewish persuasion. It is accompanied with the report on the State of Religion, of which we gave a synopsis at the time, and which we now publish entire for the benefit of some who may not have seen the printed Minutes:—

"SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST ANNIVERSARIES—1844—New York.—It is, no doubt, generally known, that in many of the agricultural districts of Rhode Island, New Jersey, New York, Virginia, Ohio, and the territory of Wisconsin, besides in several other detached places, there resides a considerable number of Christians who practice baptism by immersion, and keep the Jewish Sabbath. They are familiarly known, therefore, as Seventh-day Baptists. They held their last yearly General Conference at the town of Verona, Oneida county, New York. The total number of church-members is stated at 5,996; but as we know not what proportion the members bear to the whole society, we cannot give even an estimate of the whole body.* Their number, we learn from the minutes of the Society, has increased during the last year, and has received an accession of several ministers from the first-day keepers. We hear, even, that a minister of the Episcopal church, in the city of New York, has become a convert to the seventh-day Sabbath. As we would gladly see the SABBATH more honored than it is now in this country, we cannot help rejoicing at the increase of the number of Christians who hallow the day of the Lord. The following is an extract from the annual report:—

"The committee on the state of religion reported: That it appears, from an examination of such communications as have been made by the churches and associations composing the General Conference, that there is cause for much gratitude to God, in the apparent prosperity which has attended the efforts of our beloved brethren, who have labored in the different parts of our Zion. Within the bounds of some of our churches, many souls have been converted to God, and large additions have been made to their numbers. In the presentation of that particular truth by which we, as a denomination, are distinguished from a large part of the Christian world, the blessing of God has richly attended the effort. Many have embraced the Sabbath of the Bible, in opposition to the popular sentiment of the day, among whom may be reckoned several ministers of the gospel, whose talents and piety are such as to promise lasting benefits to the cause of God. And while the church has been praying that laborers may be sent into the Lord's vineyard, an answer to the prayer has been found in the number of young men now making preparation to enter upon the work of the ministry. It is, moreover, an encouraging fact, that the churches of our order are generally adhering to the faith of the Gospel with steadfastness. Most of the communications sent to this body, representing them as being in a state of union and Christian fellowship."

"DAYS OF OLD."

KIBROTH-HATTAAVA.

"Behold! here is the greatest of all the miracles that have yet been wrought at our demand. Rise Merab; Jabin hasten forth; the craving of our hungry souls is satisfied, yea, even to repletion may we now solace them: there is meat in abundance, fresh, luscious, delicious meat. Rise up, ye tardy ones, and gather what lies in heaps round about the camp on every side." So spake, with breathless eagerness, one of the mixed multitude which had come up with Israel out of Egypt, and who had ever been first to spread discontent in the camp, and goad on the people to murmur against their Redeemer and His chosen servant. The Egyptian in running past Merab's tent had beheld no stir within it, though throughout the host was excitement, clamor, and wild joy; and hence his exclamation.

"Souls," answered Jabin, as he raised his head from its dejected position, "were never yet satisfied with flesh that sustains the body. Let those who have lusted and murmured, and tempted the Eternal, because their palates craved some dainty morsel—let those who have spoken lightly of the Angel's food, that softly falls in the calm hour of morn around our tents, and have thought with scorn of the crystal stream ever flowing at our feet, ay, let them hasten to gather the gift of wrath; we rest content and thankful with the gifts of love and mercy." With a shout of derision, the man hastened away, making known to others the senseless folly, as they deemed it, of Merab's household, guided by the strange fancies of a dreaming boy.

The scene was marvelous; not less so than former manifestations of the Divine power. Far as the eye could stretch its view, even from such elevations as the camp afforded, the earth presented one uniform expanse of feathered creatures, piled above the tops of such low shrubs as had diversified the scene and broken the level a few hours before. Tens of thousands lay within a space that a few men might encompass; warm still, and plump with delicate meat, they invited the greedy hands that had recently been wrung in weak lamentation, or clenched in sinful resentment against their leader, while words of reproach enumerating the savory viands of Egypt, and bewailing their mighty deliverance from its terrible bondage, wrung even from Moses an appeal against them to the Most High. Every complaint was now silenced, jesting, and laughter, and the rude eagerness of hungry impatience transformed the camp into a scene of riot, while the very air was stifled with the clouds of feathers and down flung on all sides in hurried preparation for the feast. Merab went to his tent door, past which the light plumage drifted like snow flakes, while the steam of the reeking meat tainted the heated atmosphere. "It is nauseous," he said, abruptly drawing the curtain that veiled the entrance. "My children, inhale it not, lest ye also crave the tempting food, which comes not with the blessing of the Eternal."

They sat in silence and suspense, gazing upon one another; and fervently did the heart of Jabin seek the Hearer of Prayer, for strength and direction in that strange hour. Meanwhile, the sounds of preparation were exchanged for tones of revelry and triumph. The meat was in the mouths of thousands in that hungry camp; when, suddenly, a cry, scarcely less terrible than that of Egypt on the memorable night, resounded from every quarter. The deep, stifled groan of dying men, the wild shriek of women who saw their husbands and their sons expire, suffocated by an unseen hand ere the craved morsel could pass their throats, and the lamentable cries of little children frightened at the black distortion of faces, but a moment before radiant with life and joy—all these were heard at once; and greater was the general dismay, for among those who fell were "chosen men of Israel," the prime and flower of that stately host.

"Come forth," exclaimed a voice, low, sad and stern, at the door of Merab's tent; "come forth and bury these slain, ere the pestilence arising from their lifeless bodies, corrupting together with this putrifying mass of meat, so taint the air that not a remnant of Israel be left alive. We may not leave the bones of these unhappy people to bleach beneath the scorching sun, even if we escape the danger of this infectious plague." The speaker was one of the seventy whom Moses had been commanded to select to share his heavy burden; and with obedient steps Merab and Jabin hastened to the appalling task.

"The Eternal is very terrible, my son," whispered Merab, as they smoothed the hot sand over a pit where several bloated bodies had been hastily laid; "so terrible, that methinks it were better to die than to live in hourly peril of some fearful judgment against which there is no defence."

"My father, there is a sure defence against these awful judgments, for when hath the humble, faithful servant of the Lord been smitten with the rebellious and profane? We are under a peculiar dispensation, being chosen from among all nations, that we may show forth to such as know Him not, the glorious beauty of the Majesty of the Eternal our God. He hath shown us his ways, and bade us walk in His paths; and thinkest thou, O my father, that to the seeking soul He will deny either the light that can guide, or the strength that will uphold him who desires to walk humbly with his God, and to glorify Him in all things? No, our defence is sure, even in the praying spirit that never ceases to ask what He, the Holy One, delighteth to give; therefore, though we be awe-stricken at the greatness of His terrible power; yet, because of His inexhaustible mercy, we will pray, and trust, and not be afraid."

Their sad task was done; and when the cloud moved on, and Israel left the place, they called it Kibroth-hattaavah, the Graves of Coveting, a fearful memorial of sins that man is ever prone to;—unthankfulness for gifts in mercy given, and discontented craving after fancied good, in equal mercy withheld.

THE MAHOMEDAN AND THE SAVIOUR'S SERMON.

A merchant living four hundred miles from Bombay, came to that place to purchase goods. He was a man of considerable learning and influence. Seeing a tract in the hand of a boy, on the Way of Salvation by Jesus Christ, he obtained and read it. Being much interested, he came to the door of the missionary, attended by thirty servants, to learn more of the subject. He was a Mahomedan and acquainted with the Persian language. The missionary gave him the Saviour's Sermon on the Mount in the version of Henry Martyn, and requested him to read it. He complied with the request, and became so much interested that he laid aside his business, dismissed his servants, and for six months devoted himself to the study of the Scriptures, coming daily to the missionary for explanation of difficult passages. Some months after returning home, he wrote to the missionaries that nine persons had been brought to believe the Scriptures, and wished some person to be sent to teach them more fully the principles of the Christian religion.

HOW TO PRAY.

A Hottentot of immoral character, being under deep conviction of sin, was anxious to know how to pray. He went to his master, a Dutchman, to consult with him; but his master gave him no encouragement. A sense of his own wretchedness increased, and he had no one near him to direct him. Occasionally, however, he was admitted with the family at the time of prayer. The portion of Scripture which was one day read by the master, was the parable of the Pharisee and Publican. While the prayer of the Pharisee was read, the poor Hottentot thought within himself, "This is a good man; there is nothing for me." But when his master came to the prayer of the Publican—"God be merciful to me a sinner"—"This suits me," he cried; "now I know how to pray!" With this prayer he immediately retired, and prayed night and day for two days, and then found peace. Full of joy and gratitude, he went into the fields, and as he had no one to whom he could speak, he exclaimed, "Ye hills, ye trees, ye rocks, ye rivers, hear what God has done for my soul!—he has been merciful to me a sinner."

THE BUTTRESSES OF THE CHURCH.—The distinguished Lord Eldon was famous for his devotion to the Church Establishment and hatred of Catholicism, and yet he was by no means remarkable for attendance on divine service. On a certain occasion, when asked why he was not oftener seen at Church, he replied that he was one of the buttresses of the Church, and supported it from without.

THE LAW AND THE GOSPEL.

CONSEQUENCES OF SEPARATING THEM.

It may well be questioned, whether any single mistake has been so fruitful a source of evil to the church, as that which represents the law and the gospel as being separate from and subversive of each other. It was the bane of the primitive church; for when Paul endeavored to show, that there was no difference between the Jew and the Gentile, God having determined to justify them both through faith, his doctrine was perverted by some into an occasion of sin; and this evil was only held in check by the loud and repeated protestations of James, that "faith without works is dead." Again, it was the bane of the Reformed Churches; for when Luther refuted the doctrine of the popish priests, that eternal life might be the fruit of legal obedience, then Agricola went into the other extreme, and taught that the law ought not to be proposed as a rule of life, nor used in the church as a means of instruction, and consequently that good works do not promote salvation, nor evil works hinder it.

The true doctrine is, unquestionably, that the moral law must be a rule of conduct to all men under all dispensations. It grows out of the relation which exists between God as Lawgiver, and man as subject; and is an expression of the moral character of the one, and the obligations of the other. It is not an arbitrary code, therefore, but one which accords with the nature of things. The specific forms of its application may be so modified as to adapt it to the capacities of those who are placed under it. But this is no modification of the law; the principle remains the same, and will continue to be applicable while the moral nature of the Lawgiver remains unchanged. The regenerate man, not less than the unregenerate man, needs and is bound by the law. Should the righteous man, on the one hand, cease to live in conformity to it, he would cease to be righteous, and would be found at variance with Omnipotence; and should the unrighteous man, on the other hand, turn from his evil ways, and become conformed in all respects to the divine law, he would cease to be unrighteous, and would be found in harmony with the divine nature. Now we are bold to declare our opinion, that a denial of this doctrine, connected as it generally is with the assertion that the gospel opposes it, necessarily leads to some of the following evils:—

1. It leads to Antinomianism. Antinomianism is nothing else than hostility to the law of God. It matters not whether this hostility is apologized for by a profession that the gospel has annulled the law; or by such a perversion of the doctrine of divine decrees and efficacious grace, as sets aside all moral obligation and destroys the accountability of man; or by such imagined spirituality as lifts one clear above all feeling of responsibility to the law, and all conviction of sin for transgression; in either case, it is chargeable upon mistaken notions of the relation which the law sustains to the gospel, and is only to be cured by instilling right views.

2. It leads to the substitution of expediency for the law of God. Men often judge that the simple command of God is not exactly adapted to their times or circumstances, and they wish, therefore, to follow their own convictions of expediency instead of the prescriptions of the law. In such cases, if they can bring themselves to believe that the gospel has greatly modified the law, or wholly abolished it, every obstacle is removed, and they can do as they please. Thus the responsibility of a plain breach of the law is thrown off upon the demands of expediency and the supposed modification of the original statute. An instance of this is seen in the Catholic view of the second commandment, which forbids the worshiping of images. Many persons who would not dare to countenance what they felt to be plainly forbidden, still allow of images in their churches, and bow down before them, under an impression that the law is not so strict upon this point in the gospel dispensation as it formerly was. Another instance is seen in the Protestant view of the fourth commandment, which requires the observance of the seventh day. Almost all Protestants labor on the seventh day, and that without being able to give a single passage of Scripture to justify such a course. When they are admonished that this is wrong, they quiet their consciences by suggesting, that it makes but little difference which particular day is observed, since we are not under the law but under grace. In this way expediency is substituted for the express command of God, and credit is taken for the supposed improvement.

3. It leads to a low estimate of many cardinal doctrines of the Bible. Take, for example, the doctrine of atonement. It is generally allowed, that the law was so sacred and inviolable as to render the "precious blood of Christ" necessary, in order "that God might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth." This end involved an infinite good, and was infinitely desirable. It could only be secured through the offering of the great sacrifice. But how is that transaction bereft of its glory when it is represented as being required only by the transgression of a law which was temporary and changeable. The same may be said of the doctrine of repentance from dead works; its necessity and extent, are poorly comprehended by him who does not realize how great are the demands of the divine law upon him, and how multiplied are his departures from it. Where false views upon this subject prevail, many are brought into the church, upon whose hearts the law has never done its work; and who are, therefore, as unstable as water, and never excel. Many others neglect religion entirely, under an impression that the law is so modified as to make it a very easy thing to become a Christian. The details of a religious life are always vitally affected by the foundation principles which are assumed, and in no respect more than in this. Depend upon it, if that life is to be consistent and exemplary, it must be regulated by the law of God and the principle of obedience.

From what has been said, the perpetual obligation of the moral law, which is embodied in the Decalogue, is evident. It was solemnly promulgated at Sinai; it has constituted an essential part of every dispensation; it has been adopted by Jesus Christ, who came not to destroy but to fulfil it, and who has said, "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments." There cannot be a more erroneous and mischievous view of his religion, than to suppose that it sets us free from the obligations of the law. We call that man a heretic who denies the divinity of Christ, or the atoning character of his death, or the doctrine of justification by faith, or the necessity of the Holy Spirit's influences; but we may rest assured, that there is no greater heresy than to teach that the gospel sets us free from the authority of the law. Such teaching transforms the holy religion of Christ into a system of lawlessness, and turns the grace of God into lasciviousness.

THE CHRISTIAN INDEX.

"THE SABBATH RECORDER.—The editor of this highly respectable paper has commented, pretty severely, on brother Steel's article on 'Sabbath Occupations.' He also quotes the resolution passed at the recent session of the Georgia Association, in favor of a strict observance of the Lord's day, and calls on us for light from the Scriptures in reference to the religious observance of this day. As it is the part of an index to point the traveler the way, we point our brother—if he will allow us so to call him—to the record of the Acts of the Apostles of our Lord and Saviour." [Christian Index.

REMARKS.

Following the above direction, we have looked the Acts of the Apostles clear through, and do not find the term "Lord's day" once used, or a single passage which refers to it. There was one passage however, which had long been thought by some to allude to the day. It was Acts 20: 7, "And upon the first day of the week," &c. But alas, on turning to our Greek Testament, we found that the original did not refer to that day; and on turning to some old translations, including Coverdale, Cranmer, the Bishops, and others, we found the passage actually translated, "One of the Sabboth daies." Thus the last and only prop was removed, and we were left without a passage in the Acts on which to hang the Lord's day. Is this the best authority to which the Index can point? If it is, no man should follow its pointing without investigating for himself, since it would certainly mislead him. If it is not the best authority, we hope the Index will point us again, for since we find no allusion to the day or its duties we are in danger of losing all veneration for that which the whole world worshipeth.

—But in our reading of the Acts of the Apostles we did find several things respecting a day of rest to which we wish to "point our brother" of the Index. We found, that at Antioch, Paul went to a place of worship on the Sabbath, and so preached that his Gentile hearers asked him to preach again the next Sabbath, when almost the whole city came together to hear him. At Philippi, on the Sabbath day, Paul and his company resorted to the river, where prayer was wont to be made. At Corinth, Paul "reasoned in the synagogues every Sabbath, and persuaded the Jews and Greeks," which practice he continued in that city for a year and a half. At Ephesus, he did the same. In Thessalonica, there was a synagogue of the Jews, and Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, and three Sabbath days reasoned with them out of the Scriptures. In short, we found direct record of about thirty religious meetings on the Sabbath, besides indirect allusions to nearly ten times as many, in the course of the few years of the Apostles' preaching. Putting these facts along with the declaration of Paul, that he did nothing contrary to the custom of the fathers, who are known to have kept the seventh day Sabbath strictly, we were driven to the conclusion that Paul uniformly kept the Sabbath, and that if he kept the first day of the week at all, he was careful that the account of it should not appear in the Acts of the Apostles. What does the editor of the Index think of this? Perhaps he can point us to something which will sustain a different opinion. If he can, we should be glad to know it.

CONSISTENCY—ANOTHER SPECIMEN.—Several leading journals, including the N. Y. Evangelist, profess to be greatly surprized and grieved, that "few Episcopalians, and no Roman Catholics, were seen among the delegates" to the recent "Lord's day Convention." The editors of these papers ought to know, that many of the best early historians pronounce the observance of Good-Friday, Holy-Thursday, and the Feast of the Nativity, to be "of equal age and equal authority with the observance of the Lord's day," and that this opinion is extensively held now among intelligent Episcopalians and Roman Catholics. Hence they will not, in order to advance one feast of the church, co-operate with those who neglect and despise others "of equal age and equal authority." If their accusers were anything like as consistent, they would not ask their co-operation.

AN APPEAL.

TO THE CHURCHES AND BRETHREN COMPOSING THE S. D. B. DENOMINATION IN AMERICA.

Dear Brethren,—After much reflection, hesitation, and fear, I have resolved upon addressing you this letter. We are a singular and interesting people, and we live in an interesting age. We are singular, from the fact that we are the only people in all this Christian land who observe the Sabbath of the Bible. We are an interesting people, because, by the blessing of God, in the midst of every discouragement, and in spite of all opposition, we live and prosper. We live in an interesting age, because it is an age of universal excitement and inquiry; the spirit of reform is seen in all direction; the Church and the State are moving and tossing like the troubled waters of the great deep. But the voice of reform is not the only voice that is heard. The deceiver of the nations is busily striving to rivet the chains of error upon his victims; and by his own native cunning transforming himself into an "angel of light," he takes hold of the pen and mingles with the labor of the reformer, so that the reformation is not perfect but partial, and therefore needs to be reformed. How true is this of the efforts now making to reform this nation in regard to "Sabbath keeping." An extensive organization is being effected, to force the keeping of the first day of the week upon the nation. The question, "Which day of the week does the Bible require us to keep?" is not to be discussed if it can be avoided; this must be taken for granted. Now, the truth seems to be here—those who are engaged in the "reformation," know full well, that a discussion of this question would ruin their cause. If they would permit themselves to attempt an answer to the question, "Does the Bible make it sinful to work on the first day of the week?" their weakness would at once be discovered. Therefore they will not attempt to answer this or any other similar question, until they are made to do it by the force of circumstances. It now devolves upon us to bring about this state of things, a work which, by the blessing of God, we can do; and I feel assured and know, that if we go about this matter in the spirit of the Gospel, the blessing of God we shall have.

But the question arises, how can this be done? To this I answer, by employing agents who shall go through the length and breadth of our country, lecture as opportunity may offer, and circulate tracts. Let this be kept up with untiring zeal, laboring as though we were in the service of GOD, and think you not that good will be done? Only look at the past, and see what has been done within the two years that are just gone by. More light has been shed abroad, and more glorious victories have been won by the truth in that time, than in many years before; and at this moment we are exerting more influence than at any other period since the Reformation. The blessing of God that has attended our former labors ought to encourage us to further and more faithful efforts. Brethren, shall we not be guilty if we neglect to put them forth? The Lord help us to consider this matter.

TO MY BRETHREN IN THE MINISTRY.

Dear Brethren,—Will you suffer a word from your unworthy fellow laborer? A day of fasting and prayer appointed by the General Conference is at hand, this season of fasting and prayer is to entreat GOD that he may continue to plead for his holy Sabbath. Will you press this matter upon the consciences of your brethren? Will you strive to bring them out on that day? Only think of it one moment, and see all of our churches in this country at one and the same time on their knees, lifting up their hands, and raising their hearts to God in humble and devout prayer, that he may arise and plead for his Holy Sabbath! Would not the Lord hear? I know that he would. Brethren, let us bring our churches together on that day. I would further suggest, that every church bring its alms, and present them before the Lord; and also that every church which has not previously done so, form itself into a Tract Society auxiliary to the General Tract Society, and agree on taking collections once a month to further the objects of the society; and let these collections, together with the funds collected on the day of fasting and prayer, be immediately sent to the Treasurer of the General Society at New York, informing him of the societies formed upon the above plan; and let him publish in the Recorder the amounts received and the societies formed, that it may be known what is doing.

TO THE BRETHREN OF THIS DENOMINATION AND ALL CONCERNED.

Dear Brethren,—Will you not second these efforts? Do you not love that day which God has blessed, the keeping of which distinguishes you from the world around you? Will you not then pray for it? See the efforts which are made to push forward the human Sabbath in our country. Conventions are called, agents are employed, tracts are circulated, and every means which human ingenuity can suggest is called into requisition. And shall we who have the truth hold our peace and keep silence? Brethren, I call upon you as Christians and as patriots; I call upon you in view of your standing among your fellow Christians, and in view of your accountability to God; I call upon you in behalf of the truth as it lies "fallen in the streets;" I call upon you by every possible consideration that can affect you as the honored children of the Most High—to arise and plead for the "Sabbath of the Lord thy God!"

GREAT FALL OF SNOW.—Snow is said to have fallen at Greenport, L. I., on Friday last, to the depth of several feet.

"THEOCRATIC CONFERENCE."—A meeting taking to itself this title was recently held at Lairdsville, Oneida Co., N. Y. The object of the meeting was stated to be, "to communicate with each other with respect to the government of God in the earth, and to wait upon him for more light upon the subject, that we may be enabled to co-operate with him in the furtheranec of his designs." In the course of the Conference, which lasted three days, it was resolved, "1. That the time has come for the stone cut from the mountain to break in pieces the kingdoms of the earth; 2. That Jesus Christ now claims the immediate (or direct) government of the world; 3. That as the saints are joint-heirs with Jesus Christ, they should at once assert their rights, renounce allegiance to all human dominions, and take the kingdom." These resolutions were adopted by an "AMEN," and were followed by a Declaration of Independence.

OBSERVATIONS OF A TOURIST—NO. 3.

In complaining of the want of aggressiveness among the Seventh-day Baptists in promoting their views of God's holy Sabbath, I do not overlook the fact that past times have been peculiarly unfavorable to such labors. Under the Stuart line of British Monarchs, they could do it only at the risk of property, of liberty, and sometimes of life itself. For a long period, some of their prominent and most useful men were removed from their labors by the hand of persecution, and a dormant kind of existence was alone allowed them, so that for many years self-preservation was all that they could attempt. It is easy to see how successive generations, rising up under such circumstances, might have their principles so formed that non-aggressiveness would become a distinguishing feature in their character, and thus one grand element of Christian excellence be overshadowed by less obtrusive features. Then, as all the reformed governments of Europe and America have adopted the first day observance, and given it the sanction of State laws, every attempt to extend the observance of God's holy Sabbath, would bring them unavoidably more or less into collision with popular prejudices and the laws of the land. In these respects, they have had more obstacles to contend with than every other denomination of Christians; and their perpetuation has cost them more, proportionably, than a large increase has other and popular denominations. In these circumstances, it needs much serious consideration, ardent piety, and strong faith, to keep us from losing confidence in human nature, and the power of the Word of God to open the eyes of men, and turn them from darkness to light. It is thus, I suppose, that without any undue bias toward strong predestinarian doctrines, some have relaxed their efforts, concluding that "the time to build the Lord's house is not come."

It may be well for us, in such circumstances, to consider whether we have yet been tried as were the holy men of old, who waited for the promised Messiah; or even as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the faithful in Israel, who waited long for the possession of the promised inheritance. Consider well, brethren, their faith and patience. We are neither fewer nor more despised than were they; nor are we called to bear more for a promised inheritance, than they had to bear for their hope of a promised possession. While this may reconcile us to our lot, it may also encourage us faithfully and zealously to bear witness of the truth before all men, knowing the cause to be His, who of old reproved kings for his servants' sakes, and said, "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm;" and who yet says of His Son, "All kings shall fall down and worship before him; all nations shall serve him."

Besides these general considerations, there are other important matters which ought to form strong inducements to vigorous and persevering efforts to spread the claims of the Sabbath among the people of this country. I shall notice but one in this paper. I believe it may safely be affirmed, that not one in a hundred of either people or ministers know anything correctly of us or our sentiments. Very few indeed have ever entertained the question whether the first day of the week be the Sabbath, or whether it be the seventh day. To multitudes, the thought has not once occurred, that they do not keep the right day. Cradled by Sunday-keeping parents, with Sunday-keeping hymns to soothe their infant slumbers; and as soon as they can read taught by catechisms, and confessions of faith, and interesting story books, that the first day of the week is the Christian Sabbath; it is enough that they find the first day mentioned in Scripture narratives; it being already sanctified in their minds by the most sacred associations, no question is raised about the design of the sacred writer; it is enough that it is mentioned! Yet we do injustice to the mass of prepossessed first day observers, to suppose they would not entertain the subject seriously, if it were fairly presented to them. That the people of the United States are, as a whole, religiously disposed, is evident from the fact, that by the voluntary system they employ a public teacher of religion to every thousand of the population; have sixty theological schools, one hundred and five universities and colleges, and nearly one hundred religious periodicals. Such a people cannot but indulge considerable conscientiousness and inquiry upon the great subjects discussed by the many different denominations that exist among us; and it is fair to conclude, that if the subject of the Sabbath was fairly spread before them, it would receive a share of serious attention. Probably one-third of the population of this country are now immersionists; but would it have been so, if the subject had not been every where thoroughly discussed? The Sabbath has as many Bible claims as baptism. Shall it not be as thoroughly presented to the people? S. D.

POPERY AND THE JEWS.—A Roman Catholic D. D., who is now lecturing in New York on the doctrinal views of his church, recently claimed that Rome had always opened her gates and given protection to the Jews, and that it is customary for them annually to present an offering of gratitude and respect to the sovereign pontiff.

But it appears from an article in the Voice of Israel, that at Rome, more than in almost any other place, the Jew is hedged round from light, and enclosed in a magical ring of superstition. Christianity is to them identical with cruelty; and they have, therefore, no inducement to examine it. The yearly "offering of gratitude" is nothing less than a yearly tribute which the elders of the people are compelled to pay, sometimes upon the Sabbath, a day on which the Jew conscientiously objects to receiving or giving money.

BAPTISTS.—It appears from the Baptist Almanac, that the number of Baptist churches in the Free States is 3784, with 318,264 members; in the Slaves States there are 5513 churches, with 388,466 members. It is supposed that one-half of the members in the southern churches are slaves; and if so, more than one-quarter of the members of the Baptist Church of the United States are in bondage.

◆

FOREIGN CRIMINALS AND PAUPERS.—Mr. List, our Consul at Leipsic, in reply to a circular issued by the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of immigration, says that "not only paupers, but criminals, are transported from the interior of this country, in order to be embarked for the United States." A gentleman has "lately made propositions to the smaller states of Saxony, for transporting their criminals to the port of Bremen, and embarking them there for the United States, at seventy-five dollars per head, which offer has been accepted by several of them." If these assertions are true, they call for speedy and vigorous protective measures.

MUTILATIONS OF D'AUBIGNE.—An article has appeared in several of the papers, vindicating the Tract Society against the charges to which it has been subjected. The article reviews, rather severely, the report prepared by Mr. M'Lane, and endeavors to show, by a careful examination of the facts, that there is neither falsification of history nor mutilation justly chargeable upon the Society.

OLDEST MEETING-HOUSE.—It is asserted that the oldest meeting-house standing in the United States is near Smithfield, Isle of Wight County, Va. It was built in the reign of Charles I., between 1630 and 1635. Tradition says that it was the second church erected in Virginia. The brick, lime, and timber, were imported from England, where the building was framed before shipment.

ANTI-SLAVERY IN DELAWARE.—An anti-slavery meeting was recently held at Wilmington, Delaware, at which resolutions were presented declaring the wickedness of slaveholding, the guilt of the nation, the duty and policy of immediate emancipation, and the special advantages to be secured by Delaware, in her civil relations and moral character, by abolishing slavery. These resolutions were ably discussed before a crowded audience, and adopted without a dissenting voice. The meeting, though announced by the public crier, bell in hand, created no symptoms of disturbance. The number of slaves in Delaware is said to be less than 3000; and it is asserted, that three-fourths of the people are ready to sign a petition for immediate emancipation with moderate compensation.

THE TRIAL OF BISHOP ONDERDONK has been progressing in this city for a week past, before an Episcopal Court of Inquiry, at which there were present seventeen Bishops. The trial proceeds with closed doors, an arrangement with which it said that the Presbyters are not at all satisfied. The Bishop, instead of managing his own case as was expected, has retained two lawyers, and a lawyer is also employed on the other side. The consequence is a very rigid examination of the witnesses. The trial bids fair to be thorough and impartial, though conducted in a spirit not the most creditable to an ecclesiastical court.

A WORD TO OUR FRIENDS.

We have received many letters expressing a deep interest in the welfare of our paper, and inquiring anxiously what are its prospects. For these expressions of interest and satisfaction we are heartily thankful, because they afford gratifying evidence that the paper has not wholly failed of the object for which it was established. But we are sorry to have occasion to say, in reply to those kind inquiries, that our subscription list is not yet sufficient to meet our expenses; and that if our friends desire the permanence of the paper, the only way to insure it is by increasing its list of subscribers. It has now been published half a year—sufficiently long to enable all to judge of its character and probable influence. Do you think its more extensive circulation would be desirable? If so, now is the time to act. Let every such person consider himself as an agent, and do what he can in his own neighborhood to increase its circulation. By this means the work might be effectually done, and the paper placed upon a firm basis within one month. We trust there are many who will not let the new year begin without making an effort for this object. You may thus send us a New Year's Gift which will be doubly blessed, blessing "him who gives and him who takes."

LOCAL AGENTS.—We wish that our Local Agents who find it impossible to act in that capacity, would inform us of the fact, and recommend some fit persons to fill their places. In those sections where no agent has been appointed, but where one is needed, we hope our friends will either appoint one of their own number, or inform us, that we may do it.

TRAVELING AGENTS.—Two or three are wanted for the ensuing three months, to whom a commission of twenty five per cent. will be given.

General Intelligence.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

Tuesday, Dec. 10.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—The Judiciary Committee was instructed to report what amount of dividends of the old Bank of the United States, whose charter expired in 1811, remain in the hands of the trustees. A bill was introduced for the sale of lead mines in Iowa, Wisconsin, and Illinois.

Mr John Quincy Adams offered to present a petition from A. B. Kingsland and four other citizens of New York, praying for the abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Wm. J. Brown moved that the question, "shall the petition be received," be laid on the table. Yeas and Nays ordered: Yeas 90; Nays 99.

The question was then put, "Shall the petition be received," and decided in the affirmative. Yeas and Nays ordered: Yeas 107: Nays 81.

The petition was referred to the committee on the District of Columbia.

Resolutions passed by the Legislature of Connecticut on the Tariff, and on French Spoliations, were presented and referred. Petitions were presented from citizens of Connecticut against the Annexation of Texas, and from Pennsylvania for an alteration of the naturalization laws so as to make a residence of 21 years necessary to citizenship.

SENATE.—Mr. McDuffie offered a joint resolution to annex Texas to the United States. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Benton gave notice that to-morrow he would submit a bill for the annexation of Texas.

Mr. Rives' resolution calling upon the President for additional communications on the Texas question, between the Mexican and the United States Governments, passed.

The Senate then went into Executive Session.

Wednesday, Dec. 11.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—The House went into a committee of the whole and the bill relating to a uniform day of electing President and Vice President. After some discussion and amendment, it was laid aside.

The bill to graduate the prices of public lands in favor of settlers and cultivators was discussed at some length.

After notice to bring in several bills, one of which was to establish a new Territory west of Missouri, called Nebraske, the House adjourned.

In the SENATE, Mr. Benton introduced a bill providing for the Annexation of Texas, which was referred to the committee on Foreign Affairs.

Several resolutions were passed, one calling upon the President for correspondence with our Minister to England in relation to Oregon.

Thursday, Dec. 12.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—The constitution of Iowa Territory was presented and referred to the committee on Territories—5000 copies to be printed.

Mr. Giddings presented several petitions and resolutions from citizens of Ohio and Pennsylvania, praying for the Abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia; Mr. Black of Ga. opposing every petition in favor of the black population, he denounced it—(roars of laughter)—as carrying a falsehood on his face; it was disgraceful to the persons sending it, and to the person presenting it. Several of these petitions were laid over for debate. One of them was from ladies.

Mr. Giddings presented a petition from Citizens of New York against the Annexation of Texas. Referred to committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Giddings also presented a series of resolutions adopted at a meeting in Ashtabula County, Ohio, in favor of a uniform basis of representation; or, if this was impracticable, that the animal property of the Free States be represented as well as the slave property of the South. Laid on the table.

Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, chairman of Committee on Foreign Affairs, then introduced joint resolutions for the Annexation of Texas to the United States. A minority of the committee dissented, but had not had time to make a report. After some conversation the resolutions were referred to the Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for Monday, 23d.

SENATE.—A resolution was passed calling on the President to state what is the public debt of Texas—how much of the public lands had been appropriated, and how much still remained unappropriated. Also a resolution calling on the President for copies of the correspondence between our Government and France, relative to the annexation of Texas.

After some further unimportant business, the Senate adjourned till Monday next.

Friday, Dec. 13.

The HOUSE was principally occupied with the Election bill, which has been much altered in conformity to southern wishes. Without coming to any conclusion, the House adjourned till Monday.

The Senate had no session.

Monday, Dec. 16.

In the HOUSE, the bill relating to a uniform day of electing President and Vice President was passed. Several other unimportant bills were discussed in the course of the day.

The SENATE spent almost the whole day upon the naturalization bill.

AFFAIRS WITH MEXICO.—It was feared that on Monday measures of a warlike character would be proposed at Washington against Mexico. But these fears have nearly passed away. It is now thought, that our government will not be first to move in the matter.

EMANCIPATION.—On the 9th inst. Henry Clay emancipated his personal servant Charles, who traveled with him through Canada five years ago. The following is the deed of emancipation:—

Know all men by these presents, that I, Henry Clay, of Ashland, for and in consideration of the fidelity, attachment and services of Charles Dupey, (the son of Aaron, commonly called Charles, and Charlotte,) and of my esteem and regard for him, do hereby liberate and emancipate the said Charles Dupey, from this day, from all obligation of service to me, or my representatives, investing him, as far as any act of mine can invest him, with all the rights and privileges of a freeman.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my seal, this 9th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1844.

H. CLAY. [SEAL.]

Sealed and delivered in the presence of

THOS. H. CLAY.

MASSACHUSETTS AND SOUTH CAROLINA.—A most important question between these States has been under discussion for a few days past, going to show the assumption and arrogance of slavery. The circumstances are these: When a colored man visits a port of South Carolina on board a Massachusetts vessel, he is imprisoned as soon as he arrives, and the owner or master of the vessel is obliged to give bonds in the sum of $1000, that he will pay the prison charges of the man while in port. Massachusetts proposed to bring this case fairly before a South Carolina Court, and if necessary to appeal from this Court to the Supreme Court of the United States, to test the constitutionality of the law. For this purpose, Hon. Samuel Hoar was commissioned by Massachusetts to defend in a lawful manner, and before the courts, the rights of her colored men. He visited Charleston, presented his credentials to the Mayor of the city, and forwarded them to the Governor of the State. The following account of his treatment appears in one of the Boston papers, from a Washington correspondent, and may probably be relied upon:—

"Almost immediately on his arrival, Mr. H. was informed that he would never be permitted to exercise his duties there, and was requested at once to leave the city. I do not understand that any case had arisen requiring his action, but that this protest was in view of such a possibility. On his positive refusal to abandon the duties entrusted to him, he was told that if he would not withdraw, he would be forced to do so. He replied, with some spirit, that force, of course, might be used, if they judged best—but that by force only should he be removed from the post assigned him—an attack on his life was merely a personal matter.

At this juncture, the keeper of the hotel where he resided, refused him lodgings for any farther time, and in fact turned him out of doors. Meanwhile there was ground to suppose that the mob of the city would attempt his life. He was, indeed, preserved from their hands only by a number of the more influential gentlemen of the city, who surrounded him, and compelled him to go on board the steamboat for the north—escorting or guarding him thither that his life might not be sacrificed to the rage of the excited people.

I do not understand whether any part of these proceedings were under the direction of the constituted authorities. They connived, however, evidently, at the whole matter."

GREAT RIOT IN GEORGETOWN, OHIO.—A slip from the office of the Telegraph, published at Georgetown, Ohio, (about 46 miles this side of Cincinnati,) gives an account of an affray which took place on Monday last, between some Kentucky negro-hunters and a number of Abolitionists residing in Red Oak Settlement. The runaway negroes had been secreted in the houses of Robert Miller and Absalom King.

Miller's house was searched, and two of the slaves discovered, who attempted to escape, and while Miller was in the act of aiding their escape he was knocked down and stabbed repeatedly by the incensed Kentuckians. He lingered but a few moments and died. The two slaves were then bound, when they proceeded to the house of King, where they were met by four or five armed men who declared their determination to resist any search of the house. Both parties being armed, a most horrible conflict ensued. A son of Col. Towers was killed immediately. King, while re-loading some of the fire-arms in the house, was shot by some one through the window in the back part of the house, and was not expected to survive. The Sheriff and his posse arrived and checked the riot, and the ringleaders of each party were arrested.

But another band of Kentuckians soon arrived and commenced another scene of bloodshed. One of the slaves was hung without ceremony for resisting a brother of Col. Towers, who had captured him. The houses of Miller and King were burned to the ground, with all their contents. They then went to the house of Mr. Alexander Gilliland, tore him away from his family, and beat him until his life was despaired of.

The Telegraph adds: "The number of Kentuckians is increasing hourly, and the whole neighborhood is up in arms."

HEART RENDING CALAMITY.—At Walton (N.Y.) on Saturday last, the 8th inst., the farm-house of Seymour F. Benedict, caught fire about 1 o'clock in the morning. Mr. Benedict, almost suffocated by the smoke, rushed from the house, followed by his wife and one of his children, and found that the upper story of the building was in flames, where five of his children slept. The eldest girl of 14 escaped from the window with her father's aid, Mrs. Benedict went into the house again with the hope of saving her children, followed by her little child, when the roof fell in, burying in the ruins the mother and five children, all of whom perished. The young girl who escaped died on the evening of the same day, from the effects of her burns, and Mr. Benedict, the father, has become totally deranged, by the dreadful fate of his family. We have never been called upon to record a more terrible instance of calamity.

MEXICO AND TEXAS.—The latest intelligence states that Santa Ana was on his march, with a considerable army, against Paredes, the leader of the revolutionary movement. The Mexican Congress have unanimously approved of the letters of the Mexican Minister, imputing breach of faith and other crimes against the government and people of the United States.

We have reports of great mortality at Matamoras, Tampico, and other cities of Mexico, by typhus fever. It is said to be more fatal than the dreaded vomito. The crew of the schooner Caroline, of New York, lying at Matamoras, had all died, and the captain was lying dangerously ill. Richard H. Belt, Esq. U. S. Consul at Matamoras, died on the 11th ult. of the prevailing epidemic.

FROM VERA CRUZ.—It is stated that a rumor prevailed at Vera Cruz of 30,000 of the inhabitants of the city of Mexico having declared against Santa Ana, and that they had taken the field against him. Further, it is reported that Santa Ana intended to seek refuge in Vera Cruz, and that the gates of that city would be closed against him.

The Rev. Rowland Hill died at Rowness, on the shore of lake Windemere, last month.

Reports still continue to reach us of disturbances among the Mormons. A sheriff attempted to apprehened Sharp and Williams, who were charged with the murder of the Smiths, but was resisted by the people. It is reported that a party of Mormons attacked a trading station, ninety miles from Prairie du Chien, were overcome by the French and Indians, and all put to death.

ANECDOTE OF A NUT.—In Mr. Waterton's Essays there is a remarkable statement of a nut deposited for winter by some nut-eating animal under an old mill-stone which lay in a field, springing up through the central aperture, and Mr. Waterton goes on to say—"In order, however, that the plant might have a fair chance of success, I directed that it should be defended from accident and harm by means of a wooden paling. Year after year it increased in size and beauty; and when its expansion had entirely filled the hole in the centre of the mill stone, it gradually began to raise up the mill-stone itself from the seat of its long repose. This huge mass of stone is now eight inches above the ground, and is entirely supported by the stem of the nut tree, which has risen to the hight of twenty-five feet, and bears excellent fruit.

CURIOUS REVOLUTIONARY RELIC.—The Scottish Guardian states that a recent sale of the materials of a house at Rottenrow, which had for some time been occupied as the Old Man's Friend Society House, Glasgow, and which was taken down to make room for a new house of the Society, a gentleman made purchase of a window shutter, for the purpose of its being preserved, supposed to contain the perforation of the first musket ball fired in the contest between Great Britain and her American colonies, which resulted in the independence of the United States of America, and the establishment of the new colossal transatlantic Republic. A former proprietor of the house in Rottenrow brought this window shutter from Lexington in the United States, where it had belonged to the house in which the American militia were stationed who opposed the advance of the British forces under Col. Smith and Major Pitcairn, on the 19th April, 1775.

STOLEN PROPERTY.—More than one half the property stolen from the Messrs. Rockwell's jewelry store by that notorious English rogue Bill Hoppy, has been recovered. He made a confession of his guilt, and informed the officers where his share of the property was concealed. On proceeding to the yard of house, where he had been arrested, he pointed out a pile of lumber, where the booty was hid. A few minutes of digging brought to light forty-one gold watches, twenty-six silver watch cases, and four valuable movements, worth in all about six thousand dollars—which have been restored to the rightful owners.

SUMMARY.

A piratical vessel has been captured in the Mediterranean, in which was found an immense amount of treasure, being the results of a two years cruise. The number of persons who have been put to death by the crew is said to be very large.

An anti-rent outbreak occurred a few days ago in Columbia County, N. Y., where a Sheriff attempted to take some property. The "Indians" came upon him and burned his papers, in the presence of nearly a thousand citizens.

The steamboat Utica reached Albany on Sunday last, and is to continue to run as long as it is possible.

A new Steam Flouring Mill has been completed in Brooklyn, N. Y. and called the "Empire Mill." The machinery is pronounced, by competent judges, to be greatly superior to any heretofore got up in this country, and the quality of flour produced not at all inferior to the western brands.

A new steam-boat has been contracted for, to run between New York and Providence, R. I. Her length is to be three hundred feet, breadth thirty-four feet, and depth ten feet, or about one thousand tons. The engine is to have a cylinder of seventy inches diameter, by ten feet stroke of piston—which is to be constructed at the Novelty Iron Works. The boat is to be built by the well-known ship-builders, Smith and Dimon.

CURING MEAT.

The difference between doing a thing right, or doing it wrong, is perhaps nowhere more obviously shown than in curing salted provisions. There are few people who do not relish a slice of nice ham, or corned beef, and many a good housewife can speak of the various advantages, in the mysteries of cookery, which belong to well cured, clear, pickled pork. It is a very easy matter to have all these things of good quality, yet it is too often the case that we find them put up or managed in so careless a manner, that they are either actually unwholesome, or in such condition that they can only be eaten by persons of the strongest appetite.

HAMS.—The following mode of preparing hams, we have practiced for several years, and can with confidence recommend it to others.

For every one hundred pounds of meat, take five pints of good molasses, (or five pounds brown sugar,) five ounces saltpetre, and eight pounds rock salt—add three gallons of water, and boil the ingredients over a gentle fire, skimming off the froth or scum as it rises. Continue the boiling till the salt, &c. is dissolved. Have the hams nicely cut and trimmed, packed in casks with the shank end down, as the pickle will thus strike in better. When the pickle, prepared as above, is sufficiently cool, pour it over the hams. They may lie in pickle from two to six weeks, according to the size of the pieces, or the state of the weather—more time being required in cold than in warm weather. Beef or mutton-hams, intended for smoking or drying, may be cured according to this mode, and will be found excellent.

Much of the goodness of hams depends on smoking. They should be hung at such a distance from the fire, as not to be heated. They should also be hung up with the shank end downward, as this will prevent the escape of their juices by dripping. Small hams, wanted for immediate use, will answer with two weeks' smoking, but larger ones, and those wanted for keeping, should be smoked for four weeks or more.

Different articles are used for smoking. Perhaps sawdust from hard wood, where it can be conveniently had, is on the whole to be preferred. Corncobs are first rate, and are said by some to make the "sweetest" smoke of anything. Chips of maple and hickory, or the small twigs and branches of those kinds of wood, do well.

Hams are sometimes cured by adding pyroligneous acid to the pickle, but having had no experience with this mode, we cannot speak of its advantages. Another mode, which we have seen practiced, is to smoke the barrels or casks in which the hams are to be kept, and let them remain in pickle till wanted—only take them out a sufficiently long time before using, to allow them to drain properly. The barrels are smoked by being placed over small fires of chips, cobs, &c. for several hours. The essence of smoke which is thus imbibed by the barrel, is imparted to the pickle and thence to the meat.

BEEF.—The best pieces for corning, are the plates, ribs and briskets. Pack the pieces in casks, giving a very slight sprinkling of salt between each piece. Then cover the meat with a pickle made by boiling together, in 4 gallons of water, 3 lbs. salt, 3 lbs. brown sugar, 3 oz. saltpetre, 1 oz. pearlash, for 100 lbs. meat. Keep a heavy flat stone on the meat, that it may be well immersed in the pickle. Beef packed in this manner will keep a year, and will rather improve than grow worse.

Another mode recommended by a gentleman of long experience in the packing of beef and pork, is the following: For 100 lbs. beef take 4 lbs. brown sugar, 4 oz. saltpetre, and 4 quarts of fine Liverpool salt—mix all intimately together, and in packing, sprinkle it evenly over the meat. Add no pickle, the dissolving of the salt, &c. with the juices of the meat, will be sufficient. Keep the meat closely pressed together by a good weight. We are assured that this is the best mode of packing beef that is intended for keeping over the summer, and that the quality of the meat is unexceptionably fine.

CLEAR PORK.—For this we prefer clear salt and water. After having divided the hog, take off the shoulders and hams and all the lean meat, cut the sides crosswise into strips, four or five inches wide, and after covering the bottom of the cask with salt, pack the strips in layers set edgewise as closely as possible round the cask, with plenty of salt between each layer. When the cask is full and has settled for a day or two, put in cold water enough to fairly cover the pork. There is no danger of using too much salt for clear pork—no more will be taken up by the meat than is needed, and the remainder is safely left and may be used in packing a new parcel.

NOTICE.

The Seventh-day Baptist Central Association will hold its semi-annual meeting, with the 3d Church in Brookfield, commencing on the fourth day before the second Sabbath in January next. A full representation from all the churches of the Association is anxiously desired.

G. M. LANGWORTHY, Rec. Sec.

The brethren are probably aware that the object of this meeting is purely missionary. By the arrangements of the last Association, missionaries were appointed to labor in different places, to which some of them have addressed themselves with considerable success. No arrangements are made for recompensing such laborers, except what the churches voluntarily contribute to this object. Brethren, we wish you to come to this meeting for two objects:—1st. To hear the report of your missionaries, that your hearts may be enlisted more deeply in the glorious cause of missions. 2d. That you may contribute of the substance which God has given you, to forward the cause, by sustaining those who devote themselves to the labor of preaching the Gospel, and such portions of it as are peculiar to our own denomination, to those who are in darkness or in error on these important truths.

DAY OF FASTING AND PRAYER.

It will be remembered, that at the last meeting of the General Conference, a day of fasting and prayer was recommended, to be held on the first day of the week after the first Sabbath in January, being the 5th day of the month. It is hoped that the churches will make timely arrangements for a general and profitable observance of the day. The following are the resolutions of the Conference:—

Resolved, That inasmuch as the first day of November, 1843, was observed; in accordance with the recommendation of this General Conference, as a day of humiliation before God, and earnest entreaty to Him to arise and plead for his holy Sabbath, since which time a deeper and wider-spread interest upon the subject has sprung up, than has ever been before known in this country; therefore, Resolved, That the 1st first day of the week in January next, be observed as a day of fasting, devout acknowledgment for blessings bestowed, and earnest prayer that God would continue to plead for his holy Sabbath, and also prepare us by his Holy Spirit for the labor thus devolved upon us.

Resolved, That we invite all who love the Sabbath, and desire its better observance, to unite with us in presenting its interests at the throne of grace.

THE ERRING.

BY JULIA A. FLETCHER.

Think gently of the erring!
Ye know not of the power
With which the dark temptation came,
In some unguarded hour.
Ye may not know how earnestly
They struggled, or how well,
Until the hour of weakness came,
And sadly thus they fell.

Think gently of the erring!
Oh do thou not forget,
However darkly stained by sin,
He is thy brother yet.
Heir of the self-same heritage!
Child of the self-same God!
He hath but stumbled in the path,
Thou hast in weakness trod.

Speak gently to the erring!
For is it not enough
That innocence and peace have gone,
Without thy censure rough?
It sure must be a weary lot
That sin-crushed heart to bear,
And they who share a happier fate,
Their chidings well may spare.

Speak kindly to the erring!
And thou mayst lead them back,
With holy words, and tones of love,
From misery's thorny track.
Forget not thou hast often sinned,
And sinful yet may be,—
Deal gently with the erring one
As God has dealt with thee!

DIGNITY OF USEFUL LABOR.

It is emphatically a discovery of modern times, that there is necessarily, anything degrading in the labor of the hands. "From the beginning it was not so." Abraham, the "friend of God," and the finest specimen on record, of patriarchal dignity and excellence, did not consider himself degraded by manual labor. When he would provide refreshments for his guest, he went himself to the herd, and selected a calf, which when dressed, he himself placed before the angelic visitant. And the direction to take flour and make ready cakes for the repast, was given to his beloved Sarah, and not to any one of her numerous attendants. The same thing is observable through the whole Bible, and in the 31st chapter of Proverbs, we find that industry and domestic economy, enter largely into Solomon's idea of virtuous women. Have we not here, a direct intimation of the mind and will of God on this subject? In reading profane history likewise, the fact is evident that all the noblest matrons of antiquity, those who were distinguished for moral excellence, were patterns of industry, frugality, and the domestic virtues. Even princesses spun, or wove, or plied the needle, in the midst of a circle of attendants who emulated the skill of their mistress; and probably if a modern fine lady had found her way into such a group, she would have excited universal compassion, if not contempt, for her ignorance and helplessness.

But it may be said, this was in a semi-barbarious age, and that the march of intellect, and the increase of refinement has taught mankind better. I shall not stay to argue the comparative refinement of Greece and Rome, and that of the present day. Certain it is, that in many respects, the condition of the human race is greatly improved, and that as women, our sex owe more than language can express, to the benign influence of the Gospel in elevating and improving our social condition. But the student of the Bible, may well doubt, whether from the spirit of that blessed book, or the facts recorded in its pages, the right to be idle and useless, or to despise manual labor, is one of the blessings which it has conferred upon us. The refinement which produces such fruits, has at best, a very suspicious origin.

It was formerly the custom, among families of the nobility in Germany, for each of the sons to learn some useful mechanical employment, so that if misfortune or poverty should overtake them, they might not be without resource. It is to be regretted, that a custom so wise and so beneficent in its results, has passed away, leaving in its stead, among the higher classes, an almost universal ignorance of every useful occupation. The right to be idle, is too frequently one of the cherished privileges of the high-born and the wealthy, and they go through life, never suspecting, that the weariness, the satiety, the ennui, so sensibly felt, might all be dispelled by the magic wand of industry.

But it is not to those who denominate themselves the highest classes, only, or mainly, that these remarks are addressed. However we may regret the false maxims which pervade these classes, and the evils which result from their adoption, there are so many counteracting influences, that the still small voice of truth can hardly be heard in their minds. It is difficult to make them believe that the sentence pronounced on man at his fall, "In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat bread," becomes in his altered circumstances, a real blessing, and that indolence, as a violation of this law, brings with it a certain penalty. It is still harder to convince them, that "worth makes the man, and want of it, the fellow;" and that the day laborer who has mental cultivation and moral worth, is in every respect their equal, or possibly their superior.

It is to that large class, the bone and sinew of our country, who believe these truths, who feel the value of industry, and the necessity of encouraging it, that I appeal. Too many mothers of this class, from mistaken tenderness, or regard to the opinions of others, are training up their daughters in ignorance and indolence, and thus teaching them to look down on useful labor, as something vulgar and degrading. Should stern necessity, or a wish to lighten the burdens of a beloved parent, ever induce these young ladies to visit the kitchen, they blush to have it discovered, as though they had been detected in some disgraceful act. So far is this carried, that I have known cases in which young females, who, from actual poverty caused by reverses of fortune, have been obliged to labor constantly, to support themselves and perhaps a helpless relative, have endeavored to conceal the fact, even at the expense of truth and comfort. They were willing to work hard, and fare scantily, but they were not willing to have it known that filial affection, or independence of character, had induced them to learn a trade, that they might be enabled to support themselves. Now there must be something very wrong in a state of society, which prompts to such a course as this. It is an evil which affects all classes, and will inevitably, if unchecked, destroy our beloved country, as it has done the most flourishing republics of former ages.

What, then, can be proposed as a remedy for this threatening evil? It is a grave question, and one which might well employ the wisest heads, and ablest pens in the nation. A few suggestions only will be here made to those who have the training of the young in their hands, and who thus—however they may be unaware of the fact—control in an important sense, the destiny of society at large. Wrong habits of thought and feeling, particularly among females, have in most cases, their origin at home, in the domestic circle, and there a remedy must be applied. Let children be trained up to habits of industry, and active exertion, and then they will not be likely to despise others who perform from necessity, the same services which they are taught to perform from principle. Children are naturally fond of employment—and by judicious management, it is easy to make them love to be usefully employed. Every young girl, though she may not learn a trade, (which in nine cases out of ten, would be a great advantage to her,) ought to be made a good sempstress, a thorough housewife, and a constant sharer in the domestic duties and cares of her mother, as soon as her age shall qualify her for these responsibilities. Young girls so educated, and so employed, would not look down with contempt on a companion, merely because she was compelled to earn with her needle, or in some other useful way, the means of her own support.

Let children likewise be made to feel that the worth and standing of others, and the respect due them, depend not on the amount of money they may possess, or the degree of gentility which they arrogate to themselves, but on moral character and intellectual worth. How often do the young hear this in words from their parents, while every action of the latter, teaches, them that they themselves judge by a totally different standard! Children are accurate observers, and rigid censors, and often detect inconsistencies which escape the optics of older critics. It is worse than useless, to inculcate right principles upon them, while our own practice gives the lie direct to all our teaching. If we would see an industrious, prosperous, and well-ordered community, we must not only teach, but practice on the principle, that manual labor has nothing in itself degrading, and that every employment is honorable, which promotes the happiness or well-being of society.—Adv. Moral Reform.

From the Gospel Teacher.

PERSEVERANCE.

The Christian teacher should never weary or grow faint of heart. "Onward," ever "onward" should be the motto. There are many who willingly undertake the education of children, and bring much of mind and heart unto the labor, yet fail for want of perseverance. They leave off sowing their seed, because the harvest does not immediately spring up; they cease to uproot the weeds because they cannot pull them up all at once. I was yesterday conversing with a lady concerning a poor orphan whom she had once taken. "She was so ugly," said she, "that I could do nothing with her, so I had to send her back." "How old was she?" I asked. "Ten years." And how long did you keep her?" "About six weeks."

What wonderful perseverance! For six whole weeks she had engaged in the effort to save a fellow being from ignorance and vice! But the object is too sad for trifling. Here was a Christian woman who had thought six weeks, a sufficiently long time to alter habits which had been ten years in forming. Six weeks to educate an immortal spirit for eternity. Yet she seriously thought that she had done her duty. She had taken the child with the purest feelings of benevolence, her heart beating high with the thought of the good she would do, and now that her six weeks' trial had not been successful, she was lamenting with an air of great sincerity that she had not happened to have taken a well-behaved little girl.

Had she persevered, she might have transformed the one she had taken into a well-behaved child. And how much more glorious such a work, than the mere feeding and clothing of one who was already all that could be desired. Verily, if "there is more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, than over ninety-and-nine just persons who need no repentance," then would there be a greater good in reclaiming this one poor orphan from vice, than in the mere adoption and education of ninety-and-nine "well-behaved little children." In no other pursuit do we see this want of perseverance preventing so great a degree of good. The cultivator who should think six weeks a sufficient space of time to reclaim a farm, which for ten years had been left to weeds and brambles, would be ridiculed for his folly. The florist devotes years to the nurture of some rare and beautiful flower, and thinks his toil repaid. But the noblest work that was ever assigned to us, the cultivation of the human mind, is given up in despair, because it requires time and attention. How long shall these things be so?

There are, indeed, many trials in the teacher's lot, many things to induce discouragement, and when the heart is sick, and the mind is weary, with these trials, we may not marvel if she does sometimes shrink from the contest. At such times, we should remember to "cast our burden at the foot of the cross," and go forward, not trusting in our own strength, but in that which will surely be given unto us. We should remember likewise, not to expect too much at once. Slowly does each little leaf unfold, slowly does each tiny bud expand unto the flower; slowly does the fruit ripen, yet how is this whole broad earth made bright, and glad, and beautiful, by its wealth of foliage and of fruit. We must plant in faith, confident that the harvest will appear in its season. From our own spirits we may learn a deep lesson, How many years have we striven to correct one fault, how many times have we resolved that some one of earth's myriad temptations should no longer have power to allure us, yet still doth the hour of reflection prove that the same fault is still ours, or that we have again yielded to the same temptation. Can we expect from our pupils more obedience than we yield to our God? Shall we cease in our endeavors for their improvement, because they are still imperfect, erring mortals, while we are liable to the same charge, and He turneth not away from us? We will think of these things, and they will give us strength to go onward, unfalteringly in our course, giving knowledge to the ignorant, dealing gently with the suffering, and judging the sinful in mercy. Nothing shall cause us to turn back, but trusting ever in our Father's care we will persevere in the good work of leading the young spirit to its God.

A MOTHER'S PRAYER.

A mother's prayer! How subduing the influence! How solemnly her low and plaintive voice falls on the ear of a child when passing the secret place where the mother holds communion with heaven! This is illustrated by the following brief narrative from a daughter:

My mother, said she, was scrupulously regular in teaching her children the Lord's prayer, the commandments and the catechism, though in my early childhood she was not pious. When I was about seven or eight years of age, she was awakened to the concerns of her soul. She continued to perform her round of daily duties, but with an anxious heart, and a saddened countenance. This, for a long time, I saw, and it made me, though I knew not why, sad also. At length I noticed that she was accustomed at just such a time, to retire alone. And I soon found that the object of her retirement was prayer. I could hear her in her solitude, pleading with God; and her voice sounded so solemn, that it always made me hasten away to some place alone, where I could sit down and weep. When engaged with the other children in play, if I saw my mother going away alone, or if I chanced to hear her voice in prayer, sadness instantly would come over my mind, and I would steal away from my young associates, and sit on the door-sill, and weep and sob with grief. However urgent the children might be in their efforts to prevent me from leaving them, I would always contrive to get away; but I was ashamed to let them know the reason.

After my mother found joy and peace in believing, she was accustomed frequently to converse with her children on the subject of religion; but she could never summon confidence enough to pray with them. I well remember now her conversations on the Judgment used to make me tremble, and fill my heart with sadness and fear.

Years passed away, but these solemn conversations were never forgotten, and that plaintive sound of my mother's prayer never ceased to be heard. Their influence became more and more deeply impressed on my mind, till by the Spirit of God, it was made the means of leading me to seek an interest in that mother's God and Saviour.

Ye mothers! cease not to pray for and with your children. And be not afraid to let them see that there are stated seasons when you meet God in secret prayer. Long after you have gone to the silent grave, the remembrance of those seasons may restrain your children from sins, and instrumentally lead them to the Lamb of God.—Congregational Visitor.

THE DYING YEAR.

"How noiseless and how swift thy flight, O Time!
Thou brought'st a New Year's dawn but yesterday,
And saw thy children greet the welcome guest,
Joyful that they had 'scaped the jaws of Death—
That blessings had been borne upon thy wings—
Scarce have its voices died upon the ear,
And lo! its funeral dirge comes sweeping on,
Its scenes are closed, and it is gone—forever.
Fit emblem, Dying Year, art thou of LIFE—
Like thine its close is sure. Time's curtain drops,
And nought can buy the respite of an hour."

Times and seasons, as they come and go, call for the retrospect of departed hours. Dear reader, as fellow travelers to an 'undiscovered country,' the closing year invites us to solemn meditation—to an honest and earnest inquiry into the state of our own hearts. It bids us turn aside—seek the solitude of the closet—shut out the world—dissever the soul from its cares—and "commune with our own hearts and be still." Have cares and toils, with life's passing vicissitudes, and ever-varying objects, engrossed our thoughts, and urged us along with the current, since the year began, leaving little time for reflection, little for careful self-scrutiny?

It will not be always thus. The house of clay that we inhabit is tending toward dissolution. The period of its animate existence is becoming shorter and shorter as successive years are numbered. The allotted 'trial hour' will soon have fled. Life's book, and its records be closed up for the Great Day. How stand its accounts thus far? Has ought been registered during the closing year, that may be reviewed in the spirit-world with joy such as seraphs feel? Have we lived, "not unto ourselves, but unto Him who died for us, and rose again for our justification?" Has it been the supreme desire of the mind to do His will, and have all our actions accorded with this desire? If not, there is ground for repentance and deep self-abasement before God. The streams of his goodness have not been measured by our deserts. How ceaselessly have they flowed on. Belonging to a rebel race, if saved from present alienation from the right way, saved only and kept only, by free grace—

"Infinite grace to vileness given,"

—still have the arms of bleeding love and mercy been extended toward us—"as a father pitieth his children" so hath our Heavenly Father pitied us, even when we have been most unmindful of his tender care. The cup of salvation, purchased at an infinite expense, has been continually pressed to our lips. Exceeding great and precious promises, changeless as their glorious Author, have been opened before us, accompanied with the kind invitation, "Whosoever will let him come." All the treasures, and mines of wealth, found in the word of God, have been accessible—Sabbaths with their hallowed privileges, have returned—Christ's Ambassadors have been sent to us with messages of love—friends and home, food and raiment, and common blessings, numerous as the water-drops, have been freely bestowed. Truly may we exclaim with the Psalmist—"Thou crownest the year with thy goodness, and thy paths drop fatness." In view of all this, "what returns of love should our Creator find?"

If the retrospect of the past brings occasion for regret, if impenitent friends have gone from our side to the Judgment unwarned—if the savor of a holy influence has not been felt by those among whom we have had our conversation—in a word, if all the responsibilities of living in a day like this, have not been met—let us not only form new purposes, but at once set about redeeming the time. The words of the inspired penman, "The salvation of the soul is precious and it ceaseth forever"—"Pray without ceasing"—"Work while the day lasts, for the night cometh"—"The kingdom of Heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force"—"Others save by fear pulling them out of the fire"—appeal to our hearts.—Let us listen to their appeal, and understand its full import. Let us listen to the monitor within—and while reason affirms that religion must be all or nothing—that we cannot serve God and Mammon—while Christ invites to heavenly joys, and

"A cloud of witnesses around,
Hold us in full survey,"

let us make our election, and choose henceforth to give the hearty and undivided service of the brief space that may be left, to Him who has loved us, and given Himself for us. Fellow Christian, let us go to Him for grace to enable us so to do. Let us pray as Abraham prayed—trust a faithful God, as Abraham trusted—walk with Him as Enoch walked—possess the martyr spirit of the primitive disciples—become as much like our gracious Redeemer, as it is possible for us to do, "by any grace received." If spared to behold the New Year, let us thus begin it, looking continually unto Jesus—then shall it be to our souls in the highest sense, "a year of the right hand of the Most High."

"THERE SHALL BE TIME NO LONGER."

* * * * * * *

On the sea and on the land—
Shall a mighty angel stand:

Stand—and, while the abysses tremble
Swear that Time shall be no more:
Quick and dead shall then assemble,
Men and Demons range before
That tremendous judgment-seat,
Where both worlds at issue meet.

Time himself with all his legions—
Days, Months, Years since Nature's birth
Shall revive—and from all regions
Singling out the sons of earth,
With their glory or disgrace
Charge their spenders face to face.

Every moment of my being
Then shall pass before mine eyes;
—God, all-searching! God, all-seeing!
Oh! appease them, ere they rise;
Warned I fly, I fly to Thee:
God be merciful to me!

MONTGOMERY.

A CHILD OF SORROW—A THRILLING SKETCH.

During the late festive season, when those who thought at all, reflected that eighteen hundred and forty-three years ago, that religion of the heart, bringing peace and good will on earth, came to soften the rigor of the religion of form, a little girl, not six years old, had been observed by a lonely lady, sitting day after day on the step of a door opposite to her house. It seemed to belong to nobody; but, at a certain hour, there it was, wrapped in an old shawl, crouched on the cold stone, and rocking itself pensively backwards and forwards, more like an ailing old woman than a child. Other children played around it, but this melancholy little being mingled not in their sports, but sat silent and solitary.

Soon afterwards it was seen to peep about the area of the lady's house, and looked wistfully at the kitchen windows. The lady, who was kind to children, thinking that the little girl might be trying to attract her notice, opened the door suddenly, and offered it some gingerbread. When the door opened, there was a strange, eager expression in the child's eyes; but when she saw the lady she looked scared and disappointed. The kind voice and manner soon reassured the startled child, who thankfully took the offering, broke it up into little bits in her hand, and carried it to the door-step opposite, where she again took her station. Another child, seeing the gingerbread, came up to the solitary infant, who gave the new comer some, and, by gestures, the lady saw that she was informing the other child whence the gift came. After waiting a considerable time without eating her gingerbread, the poor little girl rose dejectedly and went away, still looking back at the house.

A day or two afterwards, the same child was seen lingering about the pavement near the area, and holding out a bit of sugar candy in its tiny fingers through the rails.

The lady, who thought that the child was come to offer it out of gratitude for the gingerbread, went down into the area; and as soon as she appeared, the child ran away.—Soon again, however, the child was at its old station, the door-step opposite. The lady had mentioned this to her only female servant as very odd, but received no observation in reply.

One morning the door was opened to receive a piece of furniture, and the same child again suddenly appeared, and advanced stealthily towards the door. The lady, who was near, said, "I see you!" when the child immediately retreated to the door-step.

"This is very extraordinary," said the lady to her servant; "I cannot make out what that child wants."

"Madam," said the servant, bursting into tears, "it is my child"

"Your child! But go, bring her in. Where does she live?"

"With my sister, and she goes to school. I have told her never to come here; but the poor thing will come every bit of play-time she gets. That day you thought she was offering you some sugar candy, I had been to school and given her a penny; when school was over she came to give me a bit of the sugar candy she had bought. Oh, ma'am, have mercy—forgive me! Do not send me away."

The lady, who had known adversity, and was not one of those rigidly righteous people who forget the first principle inculcated by the divine Author of the Christian creed, looked grave, it is true, but did not shrink from the lowly sinner as if she had the plague, although she had become a mother before she had been made a wife, by the gay cavalier who had deceived and forsaken her. Nor did she turn her out upon the wide world, in the virtuous sternness of her indignation. To the great horror of some of her neighbors, she told the servant that her child might come to see her every Sunday, beginning with the next. When the child, who was no longer the moping creature which it had been before, it was admitted to the mother, heard this, she immediately and anxiously inquired, "How many days and nights is it to Sunday?"

Some may sneer at this; to me there is something painfully affecting in the quiet, subdued demeanor of this offspring of shame, timidly watching to obtain a glimpse of her who had borne it, at an age when happier children are never without those greatest of enjoyments, the caresses of a mother. Think of the misery of the poor child, driven from the mere instinct of longing for its parent, to the staid demeanor of age, whilst the other merry little ones were sporting around it. Think what she must have suffered, as she gazed, day after day, at the frowning door, that shut out more than all the world's value to her. Think of the suffering mother, dreading to lose, with her place and character, the means of supporting her hapless, prematurely old infant. Oh, man, man, thou hast much to answer for!

POVERTY AND CRIME.

How much crime is committed on account of poverty! Men who have been brought up in affluence, with scarcely a desire ungratified, cannot endure the thought of being poor, and are often led to the commission of acts which injure their characters through life. Who can tell the trials—the weary days and sleepless nights, of those who have families dependent upon them, with no where to look for food and clothing? When they have committed a wrong act, who pities them? Their near friends, perhaps, while the world looks on unmoved and with cold indifference. How important that we should look favorably upon those who have committed a single act of crime, on account of poverty, and instead of casting reproach upon them, take them by the hand and lead them encouragingly to duty!

Ye who are poor, have courage! Bear up! Commit no sin, to wound the feelings of your friends, or that will cause you to look back on the past with sorrow. It is better to beg your daily bread than to lose the confidence of others. But what if you have taken a wrong step? you have repented in dust and ashes. That is right. Do not dream every body sees guilt stamped upon your brow, but behave like an honest man in future, and the past will be forgotten, and you enjoy as much of life as if you had never stepped on forbidden ground.—Portland Tribune.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

President of the Board of Trustees

LEAVES FROM A TRAVELER'S NOTE-BOOK—NO. 9.

A WALK IN LONDON.

It was a bright morning in the last of August, that business with our American Minister called me for the first time to that section of London which is known as "THE WEST END." It consists of numerous parks, gardens, and streets, occupied by the city residences of the nobility and gentry, and rivaling in splendor any thing else of the kind in the world. In walking through the city from east to west, one is astonished at the swarms of men hurrying in every direction, and the multitude of splendid equipages and extensive business places which come in his way. But on passing Charing Cross, and entering St. James' Park through a magnificent gateway, he is equally astonished at the entire change which comes over the scene. Instead of hurrying men, and business carriages, and the hum of traffic, he sees before him a large and beautiful park, in the centre of which is a sheet of water, broken by rocky mounds, and surrounded by intricate walks. On either side are green grass-plats, and in the distance are grand mansions. Pleasure carriages are driven leisurely here and there, while men, women, and children are walking or sporting on the green. The whole scene is one of quietness and contentment.

But even in this place an incident occurred to remind me that all is not gold that glitters, and that heavy hearts may often be found amid the most fascinating outward circumstances. Within sight of the royal palace, I noticed a middle-aged man who was offering to the passers-by an article for which he seemed anxious to find a purchaser. His melancholy look and modest demeanor attracted my attention, and induced me to listen to his story. He was a comb-maker, and though anxious to obtain employment, had been unable to do so for the last two months. Meanwhile he had parted with nearly every article of dress or furniture which would provide his family with the means of subsistence; some little articles which had been preserved to the last as remembrancers of departed friends, had purchased food for the preceding day; and now he was endeavoring to save those he loved from starvation, by the sale of these articles of his own manufacture. His story was told with simplicity, and with such evidences of truth as could not be gainsayed. It was but the experience of many others who had been dismissed from the same establishment with himself, and whose present suffering was only increased by a glance at the dark future. Affecting was it to see the tear which coursed down that man's cheek, and hear the choked expressions of thankfulness which fell from his lips, when a piece of money was placed in his hands, accompanied with expressions of sympathy and fellow-feeling. Would that some of those who riot in their luxuries could witness it. They would be less noisy in praise of that unnatural system which so widely separates the children of a common Father.

Having completed the business which drew me to this part of the metropolis, I strolled through HYDE PARK for an hour. This is an open space, occupying 395 acres of ground, planted in various parts with fine wide-spreading trees, and affording a great variety of scenery. Near the grand entrance is a colossal statue of Achilles, about twenty feet high, weighing thirty tons, and cast from twelve twenty-four pounders, taken at Salamanca, Vittoria, Toulouse, and Waterloo. It was raised by the ladies of England in honor of the Duke of Wellington and his associates. The park is an invaluable breathing-place for the west end of London, and is a fashionable resort at all times. But on Sunday afternoons it is a scene of the greatest display, and affords the best opportunity to see the fashionable world in the bulk. The spacious roads are then filled with horsemen and carriages—50,000 persons frequently appearing there at one time. A serpentine river flows through the park, in which an artificial water-fall has been constructed, and upon which, in the frosty season, many slippery gambols are witnessed. It is an imposing sight, to stand in such a place, and look upon the aged trees waving their lofty tops here and there, the herds and flocks feeding about you, the groups of merry children and men in every direction, the carriages of the wealthy pursuing their way by the water's edge or under the branches of noble elms, while in the distance rows of mansions surround the whole. Or, if one chooses to vary the impression, he may seek a position which gives him a wide view of wood and field, water and sky, pleasure-seeking companies and quietly-feeding flocks, while no human habitation is in sight. In either case, the scene is imposing and impressive.

Returning from the park by Buckingham Palace, I found the carriage-way lined with a multitude who were anxiously waiting the arrival of their Queen from Windsor Castle. Their expectations were soon realized. First came two horsemen abreast, with their swords drawn and resting upon their shoulders; soon after them were four others, similarly arranged; and then the whole party, consisting of some twenty horsemen, followed by the carriage of the Queen and Prince Albert, with two other carriages, and a number of horsemen in the rear. A hasty glance at the ruddy face of their young Queen fully satisfied the multitude, and they quietly dispersed without a note of enthusiasm or displeasure.

My way back to the east of London led me through sections of the city which contrasted strangely with each other; now I was in a scene of unbounded opulence and wealth, and then of the most abject poverty and wretchedness; here surrounded by the fashionable and happy, and there by the degraded and miserable. Long shall I remember that day; it was filled up with exciting and varied incidents, the visions of which float before me now.

THOUGHTS ON THE PERPETUITY OF THE SABBATH.

NUMBER TWELVE.

The design of Christ's Appearances after his Resurrection.

My last article on this subject was entitled, "The Time unchanged by the Resurrection of Christ." In this I propose to offer a few thoughts upon the design of our Saviour in showing himself after his resurrection. The resurrection was in itself a truly important and glorious event. It was a triumph over death and the grave; a clothing with immortality that body which had been subject to death. It was all-important, as an example and an assurance of the resurrection of the righteous at the last day. Hence the Apostle, 2 Cor. 15: 20, calls it "the first fruits of them that slept;" because, as the first fruits were considered a pledge and assurance of gathering the ripening harvest, and as a grateful acknowledgment of the goodness and faithfulness of God offered to man, so the Saviour's resurrection from the dead is the earnest and assurance of the like resurrection of his followers. He is the head; believers are the members; and therefore will have part of his life and triumphs.

Again, the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, and his triumph over all his foes, is the assurance that all his designs of mercy and grace will be fulfilled to his church and people. John 14: 19—"Because I live, ye shall live also." Rev. 1: 18—"I am he that liveth, and was dead, and behold I am alive for evermore, and have the keys of hell and of death."

Further, this resurrection was the confirmation of the divinity of his mission. Romans 1: 4—"Declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead." A ratification of the doctrine of atonement for sins by his death. 1 Cor. 15: 14—"If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins." Rom. 4: 25—"He was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification."

His resurrection from the dead, to die no more, is a glorious pledge of the fulfillment of his own promise, that he would give everlasting life to his people. Thus Paul says, Rom. 5: 10, "For if while we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life."

This, without controversy, is the doctrine of the resurrection. But what is there in all this to abrogate or change the sabbatic law? Where do the apostles or evangelists refer to it as changing the Sabbath time that God had sanctified? Never on the pages of the inspired record is the resurrection of Christ connected either directly or remotely with the change of the Sabbath law. His death is said, Ephes 2: 15, to have "abolished the enmity;" Col. 2: 14, that which was against us, contrary to us! This was not the law, which was holy, just, and good, but that condemnation which Jews and Gentiles had alike incurred by their sins, both being alike justified by faith in his death. Never is the death or resurrection of Christ represented, in holy scripture, as abolishing or changing holy time, although modern theology so represents it. So utterly illogical is the inference, that the resurrection of Christ is so analogous to the work of creation as to require the change of the Sabbath to celebrate it, that it seems never to have occurred to any one during the first three centuries; for during that time, no one records such a plea as ever having been made.

The sacred writers never speak of that event as the commencement of the Saviour's rest, nor even as the completion of his work. They represent him as rising again for our justification; and as ascending up into heaven to intercede for us; and as reigning as a conquering prince until his enemies are made his footstool.

The doctrine of the resurrection bearing so important a relation to the divine scheme of redemption, it was requisite that it should be well established, that it might be proclaimed to the world in all its certainty and importance. Hence, the design of Christ, in all the interviews he had with his disciples for forty days after his resurrection, plainly was, to make them more fully acquainted with his real character and dignity, to establish beyond all question the fact of his resurrection, and to commission and invest them with authority for their future work. Hence, on his way to Emmaus, "Beginning at Moses and the prophets, he expounded unto them, in all the Scriptures, the things concerning himself." The great object of the sacred record, whatever may have been that of the interviews, was to make clear the fact of the resurrection. Hence these appearances had no respect whatever to the day of the week on which they occurred. Indeed, excepting the very day succeeding his resurrection, the sacred narrative does not mention on what day of the week he did appear to them. If he had designed to honor the day by these interviews, would the matter have been left so uncertain, and never once referred to by the sacred writers? Who that seriously weighs these things can believe it for a moment? The day immediately following his resurrection was the first day; and hence the five appearances of Jesus to his beloved friends are mentioned as occurring at that time, and not as a sanctifying of the day. Every one of those events is connected with circumstances which show, that sanctifying considerations were not attached to the time:—

1st. To the four women as they were returning from the sepulchre to the city.

2d. To Mary his mother, while weeping alone near the sepulchre.

3d. To Simon Peter alone; where, and in what part of the day, we are not informed.

4th. To Cleopas and another disciple, (probably Luke,) when walking a journey of seven and a half to Emmaus.

5th. To the ten in the evening of the day, when they had met to take their evening repast, for they gave him a piece of broiled fish and honey-comb. Luke 24: 41.

No other first day is mentioned as having been graced with his presence. His next meeting was after an eight days, with the eleven, on a mountain in Galilee. Matt. 28: 46; John 20: 26. His next interview succeeding that, was with seven of them while fishing. John 21: 1—14. What a Sabbath! It is pitiable to see men of reputation and talent, do such violence to common sense, learning, and integrity, as some do, to prove that the appearances of our Saviour to his disciples after his resurrection, sanctified the first day for a Sabbath. If he did not command the change of time, his resurrection did not authorize it, for the exact time of his resurrection is as fully hidden from us as the grave of Moses. If he did not institute the first day, as a sacred day, his appearances to his disciples did not sanctify it; for neither of them had any regard to the time of their occurrence, but only to the fulfillment of scripture prophecy and the confirmation of scripture doctrine. A HINDOO'S VIEW OF HEAVEN.

Several questions were sent from this country to a converted Brahmin in India, for the purpose of learning what were his religious views before his conversion. We copy from the Christian Observer the following question and reply, which give a dark picture of practical Hindooism:—

Question. "How did you hope to secure eternal happiness? What were your notions of heaven? What pleasures did you expect there?"

Ans. There is nothing whatever to be found in the Hindoo Shastras in answer to the inquiry, "What is everlasting happiness? Paradise, (Swurga) is spoken of, where the 33,000,000 gods reside, and various classes of courtesans, and Indra reigns over them all. Those who are admitted there drink ambrosia, and enjoy all kinds of sensual pleasures. They also oftentimes commit sin, and suffer punishment in consequence. In order to be admitted there, men must practice the rites required in the Tedas; and the duration of man's residence in Paradise, and the amount of happiness he there enjoys, will be proportioned to the merit he acquires here, and after the merit is expended, he will be thrust down again to earth. There are twenty-one such Paradises, besides the heavens of Vishnoo, of Brahma, and of Mahadeva, and many other similar heavens. Besides these, there are four kinds of final beatitude mentioned. 1st. The state of nearness, i. e. dwelling near the Supreme Being. 3d. The state of transformation into his likeness. 4th. The state of complete absorption, or complete annihilation into that Being, who is himself without form, without attributes, and who is, indeed, nothing. The last is the highest state of final beatitude, and therefore they who have any desire for final happiness, aim chiefly at this. For by this alone the necessity of transmigration through the 8,400,000 different births is avoided. I also labored to attain this. Now, in order to obtain any one of these different states of happiness after death, a man must worship the particular divinity presiding over the heaven where he wishes to go. He must perform the requisite austerities, regular and occasional ceremonies and rites, meditation, alms, pilgrimages, and many other things. Nine kinds of worship are mentioned, each followed by its peculiar rewards. After, death God compares the righteousness and the sins of men, and rewards each one according to that which he finds predominating. But above all other means, the repetition of the names of God is regarded as the greatest means of obtaining salvation; and these names, whether uttered designedly or inadvertently, destroy sin, (literally reduce it to ashes,) just as fire will burn your foot if it is brought into contact with it, whether from design or not. And not only so, he who will utter the name of God in the hour of death, atones for the sins he has committed all his life, and obtains final beatitude. The author of every different book does indeed claim superiority and excellence for the way of salvation which he exhibits, and says that all other means are null and void in comparison to it; but yet all unite in saying that the repetition of the names of God is the chief of all means, and that, through this, complete absorption is attained.

TRUTH AND FREEDOM.

BY WM. D. GLLAGHER.

> He is the FREEMAN whom the Truth makes free,
> And all are slaves beside. [Cowper.

For the Truth, then, let us battle,
  Whatsoever fate betide!
Long the boast that we are FREEMEN,
  We have made, and published wide.

He who has the Truth, and keeps it,
  Keeps what to him belongs,
But performs a selfish action,
  That his fellow mortal wrongs.

He who seeks the Truth, and trembles
  At the dangers he must brave,
Is not fit to be a Freeman:—
  He at least is but a slave.

He who hears the Truth, and places
  Its high promptings under ban,
Loud may boast of all that's manly,
  But can never be a man.

Friend, this simple lay who readest,
  Be not thou like either them—
But to the Truth give utmost freedom,
  And the tide it raises, stem.

Bold in speech, and bold in action,
  Be for ever—Time will test,
Of the free-soul'd and the slavish,
  Which fulfills life's mission best.

Be thou like the noble Roman—
  Scorn the threat that bids thee fear;
Speak!—no matter what betide thee;
  Let them strike, but make them hear!

Be thou like the first Apostles—
  Be thou like heroic Paul;
If a free thought seek expression,
  Speak it boldly!—speak it all!

Face thine enemies—accusers;
  Scorn the prison, rack, or rod!
And, if thou hast Truth to utter,
  Speak! and leave the rest to God.

"DAYS OF OLD."

THE SPYING OF THE LAND.

There is silence in the camp of Israel; not the silence of true repose, not the calm of peace and contentment, but the dark sullen quietude of the ocean, when the billows have spent their fretful rage, and the rough wind that lashed them into turbulence has died away. More gloomy is that wide unbroken swell of the heavy-looking waters, than the dash of the waves when they foamed aloft. There was a consciousness of sin, of unbelief the most insulting to their Almighty Deliverer that they had ever yet manifested; there was a dread of coming vengeance, but a disposition not to bow beneath the stroke. Moses, their own patient Moses, had gone alone into the presence of the Eternal; the sudden appearance of the Divine glory in the midst of them having alone arrested their fearful purpose of putting two faithful Israelites to death. And wherefore? Because they sought to still the incensed multitude, to silence their exclamations and wailing cries, on hearing the evil reports of the other searchers who went to spy out the good land; and whose sinful fears had infected the whole congregation to such a degree, that they talked of choosing a captain and returning to Egypt, to the house of bondage, to the sore oppression whence the had by the right hand of the Lord been freed!

Surrounded, and wrapt around by the dazzling brightness of the glorious cloud, Moses was no longer visible; and overawed into silence, yet not melted into penitence, nor terrified into submission, the masses remained as when they pressed on their brethren with uplifted weapons of destruction, and each in his fellow's ear spoke the low, stern accents of unsubdued revolt. Jabin was there; no longer the mild, the tender, the persuasive boy, with more than female gentleness winning back the erring feet, but striding with energetic step, bent brow, and compressed lip, while a sword gleamed in his clenched hand, and his eye spoke a purpose not to be thwarted. When Joshua the son of Nun, and Caleb the son of Jephaniah, rent their clothes, and threw themselves into the midst of the most angry insurgents, pleading and remonstrating, and bearing witness to the beauty of the land, and urging the sure promise of the Highest, and his Almighty power to make that promise good; and when the exasperated people gave the word to stone them, and would have done so had not the sudden appearance of the glory of the Eternal arrested those violent hands, Jabin, and a few more of the youths of Israel, had rushed to the rescue of those faithful men; and, now, even during the unexpected pause, they relaxed not their vigilance, nor suffered a hostile foot to approach the two friends.

Merab too was there; alas! he was among the passive observers of what took place. His faith could not sustain the trial; his hope had waxed faint, and in the depths of his heart he was calculating, even as men left to their own resources will calculate, the comparative evils of returning into slavery, and encountering the terrors so vividly portrayed by the unbelieving spies. Jabin called on him to aid in defending Joshua and Caleb; he heeded not the appeal; his heart was faint, and rapidly departing from the living God.

But see, Moses comes forth from the Tabernacle, and all the marks of awful inspiration are upon him. He raises his voice; and to the outermost skirts of the camp it is as audible as to those who stand within a few paces. O terrible sentence, just so terrible, that the many offences of backsliding Israel could not provoke, but which now falls heavily on their heads because they have sinned the greatest of sins against the Redeemer of Jacob—they have dared to doubt the truth of that sure word by which the Land of Canaan was sealed to Abraham and his seed forever. They will not go up to take possession, when the Eternal has opened the way, and His chosen leads them on! O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself! To Egypt thou mayest not return, because for His own name's sake the Lord thy God brought thee thence in the sight of all the earth; but there, in that howling wilderness, thou must wander, and there fall, and there be mingled with the dust of the desert. Joshua and Caleb alone, of all who had passed their twentieth year, shall enter the land, on all the stately host of Israel sentence is pronounced—the sentence of death.

Oh the depth of the humiliation of that morning which darkened the tents of Jacob through the night! The veil was rent from their eyes; they saw the sinfulness of their murmuring unbelief, and many a contrite soul was brought nigh to God, while contemplating its own misery. It was a piteous thing to see the little ones of Merab's household gazing in terrified silence on their parents, who, seated on the ground, bent their heads in calm resignation to the decree, not knowing how or when the stroke might fall. It was late when Jabin returned, and the paleness of death was on his cheek, the palsy of dismay caused his knees to tremble, and his step to totter. He stood in the tent door, and lifted up his voice and wept. It was a bitter cry, such as never had been heard to issue from the lips of Jabin; and the little ones, awakened as from a trance, took up the lamentation. But his parents started from the earth, and joy brightened their countenances, and gladness was in there tone, as they threw their arms around him and exclaimed, "Thou art safe. Another month, and thy twentieth year had been completed, and the sentence had involved thee also; but not such thy doom. Praise to the Eternal, who hath shown great mercy unto us! Blessing of our house, comfort of our age, hope of the little ones who else were quickly orphans, our Jabin, thou art safe!"

PREACHING THE GOSPEL.

"In preaching the gospel, you will exhibit the truth, and the whole truth, in its just proportions, as taught by Christ and his apostles.

Deliver your message distinctly, so as not only to be heard, but understood. Sacrifice the foolish pride of being classically elegant, and use plain, Saxon English; and then the most illiterate hearer will apprehend your meaning, while the most intelligent will admire your simplicity. "If any man," said Kirk White, "ascend the pulpit with the intention of uttering a fine thing, he is committing a deadly sin." Give the trumpet a certain sound. Announce the truth fully, unmutilated, undisguised. "Preach no discourse," said Leigh Richmond, "from which the most ignorant hearer may not learn how he may be saved."

Deliver your message affectionately. Your people will hear without offence, the plainest and most pungent discourses, if they see that you are tenderly affected by the truths you utter. O, there is in pulpit love a softening, subduing majesty, before which the most refractory natures become yielding and impressible. Baptize every sentence you utter in your heart's deepest and purest sensibility." [Stow.

THE BIBLE THE ONLY RULE.

Men are safe so long as they keep fast by the Bible; the moment they go beyond that, there is danger. When the Pharisees made the word of God of none effect through their traditions, they erred from the truth, pierced themselves through with many sorrows, and shut up the kingdom of God to men. As then, so always. The farther any denomination goes from making the Scriptures the only rule of faith and practice, the more will it become involved in the false doctrines of fallible men. The moment religious teachers go beyond the Bible to say less or more on the great points of revelation, to turn to the right hand or to the left, they become blind guides whom it is unsafe to follow. The Bible is the perfect rule; the inspired guide of the church. You may illustrate its great truths, enforce its divine precepts, but you have no right to add to it, or subtract from it. How many delusions and hurtful errors have almost rended the church and ruined souls, by going beyond the written word to say more! Let us keep fast by the Bible;—and as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them and on the Israel of God. [Morning Star.

THE CHINESE AT DEATH.

Wishing to know something of the feelings and expedients of the Chinese in the hour of their greatest extremity, I have made the following inquiries of several companies and individuals. When you are very ill, what do you do? "We pray to Budh for recovery." But when you find yourselves fast failing, and expect to die, what do you do then? "We vow to Budh to burn quantities of gold paper, if he will restore us." But when you are certain you cannot recover, what then? "Why then there is nothing to be done." Do you never pray, after the conviction that you must die takes possession of your minds? "No—there is no need of praying—there is nothing to pray for." Do you never pray for the future happiness of your souls? "No; we know nothing about the future state our souls." Do you believe in their immortality? "Yes; but whither they wander, and what they become, we cannot tell."
[Rev. Mr. Abeel.

THE LOVE OF GOD is the essence and perfection of religion. It is the love of all sublime and beautiful things; the love of all high thoughts; the love of all lofty purposes; the love of all noble feelings; the love of all elevated principles; the love of all holy and generous affections; the love of all magnanimous deeds. He, then, that has added to his permanent possession one image of beauty and nobleness, one sound principle, one just thought, one generous sentiment, one pure aspiration, one holy feeling, one right act, one unclouded gleam of truth, has taken no inconsiderable step towards the attainment of that love of God, which, while it is the perfection of religion, is also the perfection of humanity.

The Sabbath Recorder.

NEW YORK, DEC. 26, 1844.

DAYS OF FASTING AND PRAYER.

The custom of setting apart seasons for fasting and prayer was adopted very early, and has been continued with acknowledged profit. Among the Jews, there was a stated and solemn fast once a year, designed to make a ceremonial atonement for the sins of the nation, and to prefigure the effectual atonement which the Messiah should make at his coming. Besides this, there were many occasional fasts, both private and public, appointed with reference to some important event which had transpired or was about to transpire. Such was the case before Moses received the law, and after the sin of Israel in making the golden calf. In the Christian Church, however, these seasons are not fixed by law, but left to be regulated by the necessities of communities and individuals. Reason and the Scriptures surely direct us, that whenever the noted inflictions of God's judgments are apprehended, or any special need of assistance is felt, we ought, by fasting and prayer, solemnly to bewail the evil, and seek the bestowal of necessary assistance. With either of these objects distinctly before the mind, there is little reason to fear that such days will be useless—much less that they will be injurious.

Religious fasting should include abstinence from every animal indulgence so far as is consistent with health and circumstances. Hence, restraint should be laid upon the appetite, and every thing which stands in the way of a vigorous exercise of the mind should be avoided. It ought to be distinctly understood, however, that this is not for the sake of afflicting the soul and bowing the head; it is simply a means to an end, and may be carried so far as to defeat that end—although there is little danger that such will be the case when the mind is really interested in the object for which the season was appointed. Then, to abstinence should be added deep contrition for sin, a humble confession and entire forsaking of it. By this means the mind is prepared to take a right view of the object which is sought, and to make earnest and prevailing supplication to God that it may be granted. We say prevailing supplication, because God has promised, that prayer offered in such a spirit shall be answered, and because the promise has been time and again fulfilled—too frequently and too fully to allow us for a moment to doubt its prevailing efficacy. Indeed, could the history of God's faithfulness in this respect be read, as it is written in the experience of many good men, we should not dare to doubt it.

In order that a day of fasting and prayer may be in the highest degree profitable, the mind should be prepared for it by previous meditation, and assisted in it by the presentation of appropriate facts and reflections. Feeling, which is not excited and directed by right views, will either be short-lived or positively injurious; and prayer, which does not embody both feeling and understanding, will seldom draw forth the hearty response of those who should unite in it. It is exceedingly important, therefore, that in the exercises of a day set apart for a specific object, the subject should be fully presented in all its bearings, immediate and remote. By this means the earnestness of prayer is increased, and the field for action is brought distinctly before the mind. A good result is thereby rendered certain.

Fasting and prayer should be accompanied by corresponding action. When the Jews of old found pleasure in their fasts, instead of loosing the bands of wickedness, and undoing the heavy burdens—in other words, doing their appropriate works—they were cast off and rejected of God. So has it always been when prayer and action have not corresponded. Do men pray for the removal of an impending evil? The prayer should be accompanied with their best efforts to remove it. Do they ask that some good cause may be carried forward? They should supply what they can towards carrying it forward. It is when prayers and alms come up together for a memorial before God, that He hath respect unto the suppliant. In such cases, faith is shown by works, and the divine blessing will not be withheld.

Many are the encouragements to special prayer for a desired good. The promise that whatever is asked in accordance with His will shall be granted; the remembrance of answers already given to former petitions for the same object; the history of God's dealing with those who delight in such seasons—all combine to encourage and assure us. Let us come before him then with humiliation, make known our wants with thanksgiving, and be assured of receiving his blessing.

MR. LEMMON AND THE BALTIMORE CONVENTION.

Mr. Lemmon has published in the Baltimore papers a statement of the reasons for his course in the late Convention. It seems that he was appointed a delegate by the church to which he belonged, in compliance with a request from the Corresponding Committee of the Balt. Sab. Association. When the Convention had organized, the first resolution offered by the Standing Committee recognized the Sabbath (of Gen. 2: 2,) and the Lord's Day (the day of the resurrection,) as identical. To this he objected, calling attention to the very different facts which they commemorated, and the very different dispensations to which they pertained. At the suggestion of the President, he offered a resolution, that the report be re-committed to the committee with instructions to present the scriptural observances and obligations of the Lord's day, and that the committee be enlarged. It was for advocating this resolution, and the principle which it recognizes, (the necessary supremacy of God's word,) in language declared by the distinguished President to be "respectful and decorous," that he was repeatedly called to order and rendered nearly inaudible by such calls; and it was for the same cause that an effort was made to hiss down Mr. Magruder, in contempt of their rights as delegates, asserted and sustained, as they were, by the Chair. It is for this, their sole offence, that they are spoken of contemptuously, as making an "unexpected attack on the Convention," as well as censured and sneered at by some religious periodicals. In conclusion, he leaves the public to say how far such conduct is likely "to promote the better observance of the Lord's Day, and secure the enjoyment of religious freedom."

DOING EVIL THAT GOOD MAY COME.

Much as we disapprove some of the measures resorted to by the friends of the first day of the week to promote its sanctification, we are far from indulging that narrow spirit of bigotry which can see no good whatever in their movements. There is one very important object at which they are aiming—and we give them credit for sincerity in it; nay, we have no doubt it is prompted by real piety—which we highly commend. We mean, the securing of opportunities to the laboring classes for hearing the gospel. It is notorious that large numbers of persons employed upon canals, steamboats, railroads, &c., have little or no opportunity for obtaining such religious knowledge as the interests of their souls demand. It is reasonable—nothing can be more so—that such persons should have a weekly day of rest, and not be doomed to one incessant round of toil, which renders it almost impossible to think of God and a future world. As far as the efforts of our first day friends are directed to this single object, we bid them God speed.

In the prosecution of this great object, however, our opponents are led to advocate principles and adopt measures in which we can take no pleasure; upon which, indeed, we cannot reflect without pain. Believing as we do that the observance of the first day of the week, to the neglect and utter disregard of the Bible Sabbath, is honoring human tradition above the ordinance of God; and knowing that our Saviour has taught expressly, that "in vain do ye worship me, teaching for doctrine the commandments of men;"—how can we feel any thing else than pain, when we witness systematic and untiring efforts to raise up such a tradition to yet higher honor? The truth of God is dear to us, every particle of it; the commandments of the Lord are precious, every one of them; and can we feel pleasure in a course which blots out one of them in order to accomplish an apparent good? No, verily. If a good object cannot be accomplished without resorting to some "pious fraud," let it alone.

In addition to the object of securing religious opportunities to the laboring classes, our brethren of other orders make it their aim to get their day—the first day of the week—acknowledged as holy time; and in order to do this, hold up that the religious community have no dispute on this point. If they really believe it to be holy time, be it so; they have as much right to advocate their belief, as we have to advocate ours. But when they represent that Christians have no dispute on this point, we do protest against it. As we have said before, so say we again, IT IS NOT TRUE. Excepting ourselves, it is not true; and for proof of this, we refer the reader to our article on the Reformatory Movements of the Day, in No. 23 of this paper. What necessity is there for urging that every body is agreed about the holiness of the day? How does it bear upon the great and important object of securing religious opportunities to the working classes? Let us see.

Suppose our first day brethren should honestly confess, that there is a very great diversity of sentiment in regard to the holiness of the day they observe; suppose the leaders of these reformatory movements should confess in the very outset, that the people of God are far from being united in their views; suppose they should simply represent that Christians are united in their desires, that the hands employed by public conveyances should have opportunity for hearing the gospel,—what would be the probable result of all their efforts? They see at once, that no day of rest, no opportunity for religious instruction, could be secured to these laboring people, unless such day were first acknowledged as holy by the appointment of God. They must, therefore, either prove that the day is holy by the clearest evidence, or make up for the want of such evidence by the round assertion that Christians are all agreed. To do the first is not so easy, and the failure to do it is very apt to excite suspicion in the minds of plain, unsophisticated people, that the seventh day is most probably the Sabbath, and not the first. But though such suspicion will arise, it is well enough understood that very few have sufficient independence to carry it out to any practical result, so long as the mass of the Christian world unite in condemning it as unscriptural, foolish, and Jewish. To insure a triumph, therefore, to the cause of the first day, nothing seems more important than to assert with the greatest assurance that Christians have no dispute concerning its claims to sanctification; an assertion, which if not wilfully, is at least carelessly and ignorantly made.

Congressional Prayer Meeting.—It is gratifying to know, that notwithstanding the bustle and excitement attendant upon life in Washington, there is quite a company of our representatives who once a week assemble around the altar of prayer, to present their own wants and the necessities of their fellow-legislators. Thanks for such a band, though small. May the little leaven affect the whole lump.

IMPRISONMENT OF A NORTHERN WOMAN.

Miss Delia A. Webster, formerly of Vergennes, Vt., is now confined in the jail at Lexington, Ky., on suspicion of having violated the slave laws of that state. It appears, that she had been for thirteen months principal of the Lexington Academy. In September last, Mr. Fairbank, a Methodist clergyman from New-York, and an old acquaintance of Miss W., visited Lexington, and took board at the house in which she resided. His business called him to see several ministers in the vicinity, and for one of them he preached on Sunday, with great acceptance. But soon afterward three valuable servants were missing; and when no trace of them could be found by the most thorough search, suspicion was raised that Mr. F. had been instrumental in their escape, and he was thereupon arrested and committed to jail. During the same night, the officers called upon Miss Webster, demanded all letters and papers in her possession, and finally escorted her to jail, where she has remained since Sept. 29. A letter was found in her possession supposed to have been written by an abolitionist; on account of which, together with her being in company with Mr. Fairbank, the grand jury have found four indictments against her, for each of which she may be sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment in the penitentiary. Her trial will come on between this and March, being delayed somewhat on account of the excited state of the community. It is said that Kentucky was never so fortunate before as to get hold of an abolitionist, and that she is now determined to furnish an example which will frighten them from her borders in future. In such circumstances, it would not be surprising if Miss Webster, who denies being an abolitionist, and Mr. Fairbank, whose abolitionism is by no means certain, should both suffer as victims of the slave code and an excited multitude. Three distinguished lawyers have been employed by Miss W., and Henry Clay has given some encouragement of appearing on her behalf.

EVANGELIZING THE JEWS.

We learn from the Baptist Advocate, that a meeting was held in New York on the 9th inst., for the purpose of forming a Baptist Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews. Rev. Mr. Frey was present, and made some interesting statements in relation to the efforts which have been put forth for this object. The London Society employs at present 70 missionaries, of whom 35 are converted Jews. They are occupied in visiting, distributing the Scriptures, and maintaining schools for children. More than 3000 Jews have made a public profession of faith in Jesus Christ within forty years past. There are more than 50,000 Jews in this country, yet not a single missionary, it was stated, is employed by any denomination to preach the Gospel to them. In view of these facts, Mr. F. urged the immediate formation of a Society to Promote Christianity among the Jews. After listening to his statement, a committee was appointed to prepare a constitution and list of officers, which were presented and adopted at a subsequent meeting. The Society is to be called "The American Baptist Society for Evangelizing the Jews," and its object is to be "the employment of missionaries among the Jews in this country." An annual contribution of one dollar secures membership; thirty dollars secures life-membership; and one hundred dollars makes a director for life.

"THE DEMANDS OF THE TIMES."

The Occident and Jewish Advocate, a monthly journal which stands as the organ of the Jews in this country, is publishing a series of articles under the above title. In a recent number, the writer treats earnestly of the necessity of a ministry fully qualified to be a light to the people. He maintains that the influence of the French Revolution, of the introduction of German philosophy, and of compulsory service in the armies, has tended to make many Jews rationalists and infidels. But the evil might have been to a great extent prevented, if the religious teachers had been sufficiently acquainted with the world. They were learned, honest, and greatly devoted to their calling; but their education was one-sided, not sufficiently practical, and therefore left them behind the age. The consequence was, that large numbers of the people ran into new theories, while there were not many leaders sufficiently acquainted with the demands of the times to reclaim them, or yield what was necessary to secure the permanency of the entire system. The synagogue, with its argumentative discourses and antiquated ceremonies, failed to attract; the official servants of the house of God were not educated to preach in the popular dialects, and were not sufficiently acquainted with polite literature to become orators and expounders of the Word; and many persons consequently learned to treat the Rabbins with too little respect. At length a new class of teachers arose, who had been educated in the schools of the Gentiles, and were learned in worldly things. But many of these, having been educated in Christian schools, valued too highly the titles of such schools, and were not sufficiently imbued with the spirit of Jewish philosophy. To meet such a state of things, which exists at the present time, it is maintained that the Jews must have teachers who understand what is needed, and are capable of contending against these acknowledged evils, both from the pulpit and through the press. In view of such considerations, the obligation is urged upon all to do something towards improvement.

The article in the December number, dwells upon the difficulties in the way of improvement, which grow out of the want of concert among the Jews in this country. They come here speaking a variety of languages, and accustomed to some difference in the forms of worship. Instead of adopting uniform customs, and uniting in the same charitable societies, they each choose for themselves a way of doing things. The writer expresses but little hope of immediate improvement among the older members of the community, because their habits are formed, and there is no medium of communication with the mass of them. He is confident, however, that much may be hoped from the future; and he therefore urges the thorough education of Jewish children, bringing them into contact with each other, and instilling into their minds the same views of their religion. Much has already been done for this object through the instrumentality of Sunday Schools, in which the daughters of Israel assemble around them the children, for the purpose of giving them gratuitous instruction in religion. The progress has been slow but sure, and such as to encourage the hope for better things. The article closes with the following paragraph:—

> "No doubt many deplore the little union there is among us; but a community of education will excite a community of feeling, and, when this is achieved, we may then proceed to unite harmoniously to develop our religion on a firm and secure basis. Sectional jealousies will vanish when people have learned to think and feel alike; and thus a greater degree of uniformity in religious observances will be produced, when one friend will urge another by the ties of school-years' friendship, and by the bond of love for some revered teacher removed from the earth, to swear fealty to the laws of Heaven, which they both imbibed in those years, and under the same guide, when their hearts were innocent, and their aspirations were redolent with purity."

THE TRUE WESLEYAN.

The editor of this paper devotes one column and a half of his last number to defining his position and commenting upon our propositions. The gist of the article may be enclosed in a nut-shell, and we shall therefore dispose of it with few words.

It will be remembered, that in our first article we denied, among other things, two positions taken by a correspondent of the Wesleyan, viz:—"1. That the first day of the week has been 'divinely appointed as the Christian Sabbath;' 2. That this question has 'been long since settled in the minds of all pious, sensible men.'" In reply to this denial, the editor of the Wesleyan published a somewhat lengthy article, from which we found it difficult to learn either his views or how far he became responsible; on which account, we proposed to discuss with him the simple question at issue between us. It now appears, that he meant to assume the responsibility only "so far as is implied in the statement, that Christians generally hold that the first day is the Sabbath by divine authority." An innocent statement, surely, and one about which we have no disposition to dispute with the Wesleyan, since it has nothing to do with the real question. But, whether this statement is any reply to our denials; and also, whether the article in which the statement should have been distinctly made, was not designed, by saying a great many irrelevant things, to leave an impression that something had been said to the point; these are questions about which we leave the reader to decide.

So much for the responsibility assumed by the editor. Now for his disposal of our two propositions. The first proposition—which was, that he should prepare an article for the Recorder, proving the divine appointment and present obligation of the first day—he declines, for want of time, and because he has no disposition either to benefit or injure the Recorder by writing for it. The second proposition—which was, that we would prepare an article for the Wesleyan, proving the divine appointment and present obligation of the seventh day—he declines, because it would take up room, and probably lead to a protracted discussion.—Lastly, he declines accepting either proposition, because there are now to be had as good arguments on both sides as either of us could write. Very satisfactory reasons indeed! We wonder that they have not long ago induced the editor to save his time and his room by ceasing to talk about the evils of Bishops and Slavery. Does he expect to improve upon what John Wesley has already said in regard to each of these questions? We trust not.—But, though there are very good books extant on both sides of the question, we doubt, from the positions taken by the editor of the Wesleyan, whether he has read and digested many of them. We might send him a work on the History of the Sabbath, by the learned Dr. Peter Heylyn, in which he shows, that the divine appointment of the first day for the Sabbath was never taught in England until the year 1595. We might send him another work by Edward Fisher, proving, "That the Day of Christ's Nativity, the Day of his Passion, and the like, have equal authority, equal antiquity, equal right to be observed, as the Lord's Day." We might send him another work still by Edward Brerewood, showing that very large numbers of nominal Christians in the oriental world observe the seventh day; to say nothing of the Mahommedans, who observe the sixth day, or of the members of the Greek and Roman churches, none of whom regard the first day as divinely appointed for the Sabbath. If these works do not prove, that there are very many "pious, sensible men," who doubt the divine appointment of the first day; nay, more, that the number who hold that view is very small in comparison with the whole world—we should despair of proving any thing from history. It should be remembered, that there are large sections of country aside from our own, and that, therefore, the statistics which the Wesleyan has gathered from "the American Almanac for 1845," are not the only witnesses.

In conclusion, we have only to say, that since the editor of the Wesleyan declines entering upon a discussion, we are not disposed to press him to try his steel with us. As he thinks he can fill his columns more to the advantage of the cause of truth, he is at liberty to do so; and we shall be happy to see that his expectations are realized.

LETTER FROM ELD. AZOR ESTEE.

Believing that the friends of the Mission in which I am engaged would be pleased to hear from me, and be made acquainted with the encouragement I have met with in calling the attention of the religious community to the subject of the Sabbath, I have concluded, through the Recorder, to give them a brief summary of my labors.

More than three weeks have now elapsed since I left home and entered upon missionary labor. For the most part of this time, I have been exclusively among those who observe the first day of the week for the Sabbath. I am now at Ephrata, Pa., and have probably journeyed more than three hundred miles. My plan has been to spend a little time in each of the cities, large towns and villages, through which I have passed. This time I have improved in calling the attention of clergymen and other leading individuals to the subject of the Sabbath. I have had the privilege of conversing on this subject with nearly forty clergymen of different denominations. These interviews have been so conducted, as invariablo to result pleasantly. At such times, I have endeavored to present briefly to each clergyman the argument for keeping the original Sabbath, and at the same time to answer the various arguments offered in favor of keeping the first day for the Sabbath. I have been gratified in witnessing the interest manifested in this subject by clergymen and others with whom I have conversed. In almost every instance, I have found it easy to awaken an interest, and to increase it by conversation. The desire to receive our publications appears to be very general among all classes. In some cases, I have unexpectedly come in contact with those who have examined this subject, and have become thoroughly convinced that the seventh day is the only Sabbath. Of these, I found some who had commenced keeping the Sabbath, and others who were halting, but who will soon, I think, obey the commandment, at whatever sacrifice, and thereby secure peace of conscience, and enjoy the fruits of obedience. My earnest prayer is, that the seeds of truth which have been widely scattered, may spring up, bear fruit, and eventually produce an abundant harvest. Were I able, I would gladly, in the course of the present season, explore the whole United States, visit every city, town, and village, and call the attention of all to this important subject. I ask the prayers of every lover of Christ, that God will bless his own truth on this subject, and promote his own glory by its dissemination among the people at this time.

A. ESTEE.

Ephrata, Pa., Dec. 16, 1844.

P. S. As I was passing from Flemington, N. J., to Centre Bridge, my horse took fright, overturned the wagon, precipitated me and all my load to the ground, ran a short distance, and fell, breaking its own neck, and killing itself instantly. Though an unpleasant dilemma to be in so far from home, I had occasion to bless the Lord for his mercy in preserving me. In the course of the day, I purchased a horse, regulated my wagon, and proceeded on my journey.

New Year's Presents.—The following suggestion of a correspondent of the Morning Star, is timely and wise. We commend it to the consideration of all "to whom these presents may come," in hope that some such will "go and do likewise":

> "It is about time that our friends should begin to think about making New Year's presents to our Printing Establishment. I have concluded that my present shall be TWENTY new, PAYING subscribers for the Star, with the money in advance, or to be paid without fail within three months."

Dr. Belcher.—We learn that Dr. Joseph Belcher, who came to this country from England about a year since, has received a call to the pastoral care of a Baptist church in Halifax, has accepted the call, and entered upon the duties of his office.

It is asserted, that the volumes published in London alone are so numerous, that if twenty-five men were employed twelve hours a day in reading, at the rate of eight words per minute, they would barely keep up with the volume publications.—If to this were added the tracts, sermons, magazines, reviews, and newspapers, it would require the constant reading of upwards of eighty men.

A missionary in India, says that in that country a "widening door of usefulness is opening before the Christian press. It is destined to do great things even in India—poor, fallen, sin-bound, superstition-shackled, demon-infatuated India."

Rev. T. J. Hinton, author of a work on Baptism, is about to take charge of a Baptist church recently constituted in New Orleans.

Another effort is to be made this winter to secure the incorporation of the American and Foreign Bible Society.

We regret to learn (says the Banner of the Cross) that Bishop Cobbs, of Alabama, while on his late passage, with his family, to New Orleans, lost the whole of his furniture by the sinking of the steamer near that city, together with a chest containing a large collection of manuscript sermons.

On the 28th of last month, at Grafton, York Co., Va., the Rev. James B. L. Williams of the Methodist Episcopal, and the Rev. John Curtis of the Baptist Reformed Church, met agreeably to previous appointment, for the purpose of discussing some doctrinal points upon which they differed; and the latter, who opened the debate, had nearly finshed his opening speech, when he complained of being unwell. A physician being present, remedies were forthwith resorted to, but in a few moments he was a corpse. [Bapt. Record.

EUROPEAN NEWS.

By the Acadia, which reached Boston on the 21st, news has been received to the 4th inst.

The Cotton Market was very dull.

The English papers have much to say about the results of the late election—some of them speaking of it as a triumph of Slavery and the Annexation interests, while others regard it very differently, and express doubts whether Annexation and a repeal of the Tariff can be secured. The French papers have something to say upon the same subject, but are more occupied in discussing the depressed state of their own manufacturing interests.

In Spain, a new insurrection had broken out under Martin Zurbano, an old Chief, but had not gone far. The British minister had demanded that General O'Donnell be recalled from Cuba, and this demand had given considerable umbrage.

From Circassia, reports have been received very unfavorable to the Russians. It is said that several severe battles have been fought, and that the losses of the Russians, between killed, wounded and missing, amount to 60,000; whilst those of the mountaineers amounted to 12,000.

Ireland.—Mr. O'Connell has again taken the field in support of Repeal. He attended the regular weekly meeting of the Repeal Association at Dublin, and made an address to encourage his friends to persevere in "the one great paramount object." Liberal contributions were acknowledged from various parts of America. A Rev. Mr. Moriarty, from Philadelphia, was present at one of the meetings for the purpose of raising money for rebuilding the churches destroyed in that city during the riots between the Native Americans and the Roman Catholics. Mr. O'Connell bitterly assailed "the barbarous mob that got the authorities to disarm the Roman Catholics and then attacked them." Mr. Moriarty, on rising to address the meeting, was received with loud cheering, and he proceeded to speak at some length upon the subject of his mission. If his remarks are reported aright in the English journals, they were exceedingly jesuitical and one-sided—bitter, malignant, vindictive and false.

Mr. O'Connell had also spoken at Limerick and other places. His appearance in public after his sojourn at Derrynane, was welcomed every where with the utmost enthusiasm.

The late crop of potatoes in Ireland is found to exceed the product of any year on record.

Great Robbery.—An extensive robbery has been committed in the banking-house of Messrs. Rogers, Towgood & Co. bankers, of Clement's lane, London. Bank notes to the amount of from £35,000 to £40,000 or £41,000 were stolen out of the iron safe, which is deposited in the hall of the inner office, and securities to a very large amount were taken by the thieves.

The Pictorial London papers are full of illustrations of the late election processions in this city. Tammany Hall is quite conspicous in the drawing.

There have been great inundations in Italy, and immense damage has been done by the water. For five hundred years Florence has not known such disasters as have attended the rise of the Arno.

The pious Princess Dorothea de Czartouska has recently died in a convent of the Ursulines.

Some giraffes arriving at Genoa were not able to enter the town gate.

A valuable manuscript of the sixteenth century has been brought to light.

Alexander Dumas has leased himself out to the Proprietor of the Presse, at 60,000 francs a year. Eugene Sue belongs to the Constitutionel.

The Bishop of London has recently declared that he is entirely opposed to Puseyite or Tractarian principles.

At a recent numerous meeting, the Glasgow Emancipation Society adopted a protest against the receipt of monies contributed by slaveholders to the Free Church of Scotland, and a memorial exhorting all Christian denominations to repudiate fellowship with slaveholders; the slaveholders in question being citizens of the United States.

The Clock at Lunden.—The cathedral at Lunden, in Sweden, is a magnificient structure, and has a very lofty spire, which serves as a mark for sailors, being seen at a considerable distance. The altar of this church is a beautiful piece of work, but what most engages the attention of strangers is its curious clock, which from the number of its movements and figures, may vie with those of Lyons and Strasburg. Every hour two horsemen come out and encounter, and a door opens which discovers the Virgin Mary sitting on a throne with her divine infant in her arms, and the magii, with their retinue, marching in order and presenting their gifts, two trumpets sounding all the time of the procession. The clock, besides the hour, shows the month and day, and festivals throughout the year. [Smith's Wonders.

Old Relics.—The bell in St. Peter's Church at Albany, N. Y. has this inscription: 'St. Peter's Church, in Albany, 1751; J. Ogilvie, Minister; J. Stevenson, E. Collins, Wardens.' The Bible now used is over 100 years old, having been printed in 1716. The communion plate, which is very heavy, and numbers seven pieces, was a present from Queen Anne. Upon each piece is engraved the following: 'The gift of her Majesty, Anne, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, and of her plantations in North America, Queen, to her Indian Chapel, of the Onondauguas.'

South Carolina.—On the 16th inst. Mr. Pickens introduced resolutions into the South Carolina Senate, on the subject of the Abolition petitions, and the repeal of the 25th Rule by Congress.—They condemn the action of the House, and declare that any movement by Congress toward the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, will be regarded by that state as a virtual dissolution of the Union. The Senate unanimously adopted them. The House has agreed to consider them.

Arrangements have been made for the delivery in Washington this season of a course of eight lectures on various popular subjects. Among the distinguished gentlemen whose services have been secured are the Hon. John Quincy Adams, the Hon. Levi Woodbury, and Prof. Morse. The latter will treat of his Telegraph and his recent improvements.]

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

[Compiled for the Recorder.]

Tuesday, Dec. 17.

House of Representatives.—Much time was spent in considering resolutions from the States, and hearing notices of proposed bills. A resolution was introduced modifying the tariff of 1842 somewhat, as it respects imports on wines, silks, &c., and imposing a nominal duty on some things now admitted free. It was laid over.

A resolution was introduced to instruct the Post Office Committee to make certain alterations in the postage on letters, &c. Five cents proposed as the highest duty on a single letter.

After some rather heated discussion of a bill for refunding duty on railroad iron in certain cases, the House adjourned.

In the Senate, a bill was introduced to compromise with the sureties of Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the port of New York, which was referred to committee on judiciary.

Wednesday, Dec. 18.

House.—The bill to remit duties on railroad iron in certain cases, was debated at considerable length, as involving the Tariff question, and was finally laid on the table. Several private bills were referred; and the House, after several attempts to proceed with business, adjourned in great confusion.

In the Senate, a bill was passed for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton, and also a resolution calling for information relative to Texas.

An attack was made to-day upon John Quincy Adams. The circumstances attending this outrage are these: A man named Sangster, of Washington, or of Alexandria, sent word by one of the messengers that he wanted to see Mr. Adams. Mr. A. went out to the lobby, when a man whom he had never seen before stepped up to him and said, "You are wrong, and I will kick you!" He then made a pass with his hand at Mr. A.'s face, followed by another attempt to strike, when Mr. A. seized both his hands and held them until some of the bystanders separated them. Mr. Adams was quite cool, and did not seem to mind it much. The offender was taken into custody and delivered to the city authorities.

Thursday, Dec. 19.

House.—A resolution was introduced, requesting the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of continuing Morse's Telegraph from Baltimore to New York, through Philadelphia.

Mr. Weller introduced a joint resolution for the Annexation of Texas, which was, after much discussion, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. Pollard gave notice that he would introduce a bill for the Annexation of Texas, to be decided by the people through the ballot-box.

A Message respecting Mexico and Texas was received from the President accompanied by the correspondence between our minister and the Mexican minister. Referred to Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The bill to graduate the price of land was discussed somewhat, and a bill to reduce postage introduced.

In the Senate, the principal business was the reading of the Message on our relations with Mexico, and a discussion on Mr. Atkison's bill to organize a government in the Territory of Oregon. Adjourned till Monday.

[The Message, so long expected, commences with a string of complaints against Mexico, as though she would rob us of a part of our territory, and ends with asking Congress to take measures for immediate annexation. There is no reason to fear that it will lead to war at once.]

Friday, Dec. 20.

The House went into a committee of the whole on the State of the Union. The law of last session relative to the safe keeping of the public money, known as the Sub Treasury Law, was taken up. Several gentlemen opposed the law as unconstitutional, and others defended it, each referring to the late election for proof of the people's opinion. The discussion continued until the House adjourned.

Saturday, Dec. 21.

House.—The debate on the Sub-Treasury was continued, and with much political sparring, for two hours; after which the bill was passed; yeas 123—nays 68. The Bill is the same as reported last Session—the periods when the different provisions shall take effect being '45, '46 and '47, instead of '44, '45 and '46, and also that a receiver general be located at St. Louis in Missouri.

The House then adjourned till Monday, when the special order of the day is the joint resolutions for the Annexation of Texas.

United States Army.—From a paper just published, it appears that the regular army of the country consists of 8000 men, and costs the nation the annual sum of $8,000,000. This would be $1000 for each man. The pay of a private is given at $96 per annum, and his clothing and rations would perhaps amount to as much more, making about $200 per annum. The pay and expenses of the officers, including the general officers, is stated at about $2,000,000, leaving about $5,000,000 for the expenses of the war department, the salaries of the secretary of war, the heads of the Indian and pension departments, clerks, &c. [Bangor Gaz.

Oregon.—According to the last advices, the American population now in the Oregon settlement is upwards of two thousand. They have formed themselves a Government, elected Executive and Legislative officers, established Courts of Justice, and a Record Office of land Titles, Schools and Churches are provided, mills to supply lumber and for the manufacture of flour are in operation; cattle and stock of all kinds are rapidly increasing, farms are in cultivation, and fisheries yield abundantly. To meet the growing wants of a civilized community, money has been sent to New York for a printing press and a steam engine.

The Pensacola Gazette contends that the Court which sentenced Capt. Walker, showed "unparalleled forbearance," seeing that in addition to branding and the pillory, it might, have sentenced him to $1000 fine and six months imprisonment; whereas he is fined but $150 and imprisoned fifteen days! [Emancipator.

On Tuesday morning last, one of Bolen's revolving pistols was picked up by a teamster, on Port Carbon road, who took it to the machine establishment of Messrs. Haywood and Snyder.—While in the act of examining it, one of the barrels was accidentally discharged, the ball taking effect in the cheek of a young man, aged about 17 years, named John Blesius, from the wound of which he died in about two hours afterward.—Pottsville Miner of Saturday.

Letters from Prison.—Under this title, it is proposed to publish a selection of Charles T. Torrey's letters and papers, written while in Baltimore jail. Appended to them will be his defence read before the court. The volume will be edited by his wife, Mrs. Mary Ida Torrey, and published for the benefit of his family.

Immigration.—The following is an abstract from the official report of the Department, of the number of passengers that have arrived in the United States from foreign countries, during the year ending September 30, 1844:

Maine	3,649	Vermont	197
New Hampshire	256	North Carolina	5
Massachusetts	6,440	South Carolina	330
Rhode Island	154	Florida	58
Connecticut	58	Louisiana	3,889
New York	59,762
Pennsylvania	4,886	Total	84,764
Delaware	32	Of which were
Maryland	5,006	males	48,897
District of Columbia	32	females	35,864

Anti-Rent.—The Anti-Rent meeting at Claverack, Dec. 18, terminated in a most melancholy manner. It was held at a village called "Smoky hollow." A man from Hillsdale was there as a spectator, named Rizenburgh. He had spoken against the proceedings, as is said, and was required by one of the Indians to cry "down with the rent." He refused, and the Indian presented his pistol and repeated the demand. Upon the second refusal, the Indian shot him through the body, and he expired immediately. The Indians thereupon broke up the meeting and dispersed. "Big Thunder" and two of his associate Indians have been arrested, and are in jail. The death of R. is claimed to have been accidental.

Freighting Business on the Railroads.—The railroads are doing quite an extensive business in the freighting line. The goods and produce detained by the ice in the canal have mostly been got out and sent forward to their respective destinations. Within a few days, considerable quantities of goods have been shipped at Albany, for merchants at the west, who have purchased since the canal closed. Some thirty tons of freight passed through on its way to Auburn on Saturday. The Oyster trade is growing into an immense business—tons upon tons of this ocean luxury are arriving and going west, to be distributed into all the remote counties, and we suppose all along the borders of Lake Erie. In return, four tons of Poultry passed east a few evenings since. This is probably the first invoice of Poultry ever sent from the west. [Syracuse Jour.

Fisher Ames.—The Monument to perpetuate the memory of the illustrious Fisher Ames, was raised at Dedham, Mass., on Thursday. It is a plain column of white marble, nine feet and four inches high, bearing on one side the name "Fisher Ames." On another, "Fisher Ames, died July 4, 1808, aged 50," and beneath the names of two of the deceased sons, John W. and Nathaniel. The opposite side bears the name, "Frances Ames, died August 8, 1837, aged 84." Beneath, the names of Hannah, the only daughter, and Jeremiah Fisher, the fifth son. The only ornament is an inverted torch, surrounded by a wreath.

Anti-Slavery in Kentucky.—A correspondent of the Syracuse Democrat publishes an extract of a letter from a gentleman in Louisville, Kentucky. He says:—"There is a great deal of Anti-Slavery sentiment in this city, much more than you would suppose. I know the sentiments of most of our leading men, and I believe next year a decided step will be taken to amend the Constitution of Kentucky, with a view to the extirpation of Slavery. It is ruining us as a people, impoverishing us as a State, and poisoning our public and private morals, and I hope to see it destroyed even in Kentucky. About six months since, I wrote to C. M. Clay, at Lexington, suggesting a plan of operations to be commenced immediately after the Presidential elections, on the part of the Anti-Slavery friends in various parts of the State. He coincided with me, and a plan is matured and the ball will be put in motion this year. More of this hereafter."

A disgraceful affray took place in Broadway, New York, on Friday last, between a Mr. Grousset and a Mr. Emeric, both of them business men of some influence. Grousset, it is said, spat in the face of Emeric, when the latter drew a six-barreled pistol and discharged one of the barrels at him without effect. Grousset pressing upon Emeric, the latter discharged a second barrel, the ball from which took effect on the right side of Mr. Grousset, striking a lower rib and glancing downward towards the front part of and below the hip, making, however, only a flesh wound. Mr. Emeric immediately after Mr. Grousset fell, gave himself up, and accompanied several citizens to the police office, where he was admitted to bail in the sum of $10,000. The quarrel originated in a duel which took place in France between Emeric and another gentleman, in which Grousset acted as Emeric's second.

A fire broke out in Salem, (Mass.) on Thursday morning last in the steam sawing and planing establishment of James N. Boffame, on Front-street, formerly Deacon Giles's Distillery. This establishment was soon burnt down. The fire then burnt Griffin's large sailor boarding-house, Peele's Row, (containing 14 tenants,) the whole South side of Front-street, Concert Hall, many stores and private dwellings. The loss is estimated at $100,000.

Six men have been confined in the jail of Portland, Me., for selling rum. It used to be the case that those who drank generally got into jail, but if the tables are turned, we are glad of it; for the poor drunkards have been made to suffer enough, while those who put the bottle to their lips, and cause their ruin, have been considered gentlemen, and have been bolstered up by law.

An old man who had been a slave, replied to an assertion that the Bible justified slavery, by inquiring what slavery it justified, black or white? He thought it a poor rule that would not work both ways, and thought it about time to change sides with those who sought an authority for slavery from the Bible.

In the Lower House of the Alabama Legislature, on the 6th inst., there was a discussion upon a bill to emancipate Gertude, a Creole slave. The bill was discussed with much wamth. Many gentlemen expressed opposition to emancipation of slaves under any circumstances. We suppose from this, that in Alabama no man can emancipate a slave without special legislative act. The bill was passed.

NOTICE.

The Seventh-day Baptist Central Association will hold its semi-annual meeting, with the 3d Church in Brookfield, commencing on the fourth day before the second Sabbath in January next. A full representation from all the churches of the Association is anxiously desired.

G. M. Langworthy, Rec. Sec.

The brethren are probably aware, that the object of this meeting is purely missionary. By the arrangements of the last Association, missionaries were appointed to labor in different places, to which some of them have addressed themselves with considerable success. No arrangements are made for recompensing such laborers, except what the churches voluntarily contribute to this object. Brethren, we wish you to come to this meeting for two objects:—1st. To hear the report of your missionaries, that your hearts may be enlisted more deeply in the glorious cause of missions. 2d. That you may contribute of the substance which God has given you, to forward the cause, by sustaining those who devote themselves to the labor of preaching the Gospel, and such portions of it as are peculiar to our own denomination, to those who are in darkness or in error on these important truths.

DAY OF FASTING AND PRAYER.

It will be remembered, that at the last meeting of the General Conference, a day of fasting and prayer was recommended, to be held on the first day of the week after the first Sabbath in January, being the 5th day of the month. It is hoped that the churches will make timely arrangements for a general and profitable observance of the day. The following are the resolutions of the Conference:—

Resolved, That inasmuch as the first day of November, 1843, was observed, in accordance with the recommendation of this General Conference, as a day of humiliation before God, and earnest entreaty to Him to arise and plead for his holy Sabbath, since which time a deeper and wider-spread interest upon the subject has sprung up, than has ever been before known in this country; therefore, Resolved, That the 1st first day of the week in January next, be observed as a day of fasting, devout acknowledgment for blessings bestowed, and earnest prayer that God would continue to plead for his holy Sabbath, and also prepare us by his Holy Spirit for the labor thus devolved upon us.

Resolved, That we invite all who love the Sabbath, and desire its better observance, to unite with us in presenting its interests at the throne of grace.

For the Recorder.

THE DAY OF JOY SHALL COME.

The day of joy shall come; e'en now the east
Begins to glow with golden tints of morn;
The sun, in dazzling splendor clothed, will soon
Appear, and shed a light of glory forth
Upon the earth. How great will be the change!
The millions, who in darkness slumber now,
Shall wake to hail the morn, the joyous morn,
Which ushers in the day, whose light shall spread
Upon the globe, disperse the clouds of gloom,
And back upon itself the darkness roll,
Until at last, from thousand lands o'er which
It long hath hung, it pass away. Then, they
Who now like brutes do live, shall see and know
Their degradation, and no longer love
To wallow in pollution, but rise
To dignity of sons of God. The pure,
The holy Gospel, will exert its power,
Restrain their passions wild, assuage
Their grief. Contentions then will cease! War clang
No longer reach the ear; but in its place
Shall Music's notes be heard! From every part
Of earth a song of joy will rise. 'Twill swell
From deepest valleys, and in echoes loud,
Return from loftiest mountain tops. The gale
From north will seize the joyous notes, and bear
Them swiftly to the south; the southern wind
Will catch the strain, and bear it swiftly back;
The eastern breeze will take the music up,
And waft it to the west; and zephyrs from
The west will gently float it back to east;—
Old Ocean, on his crested waves, will take
It up, and roll it forth from pole to pole,
From continent to continent, from isle
To isle. O yes! the day of joy shall come,
The blest millennial day, when all, with one
Accord, shall join in keeping sacred that
Which God has said is holy time. Their songs
Of praise to God and His Eternal Son,
United then, will sound through all the earth.
Come, quickly come, thou glorious, joyous day!

REMLAP.

Hopkinton, R. I. Nov. 28, 1844.

From the Cultivator for December.

PRODUCTS OF THE YEAR 1844.

WHEAT.—This great staple product, has yielded variously in different sections of the country; but in a territory embracing so many degrees of latitude, and possessing so varied a climate, it can hardly be expected that the same crop will succeed equally well in all parts, the same season. In Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont, spring wheat is generally cultivated, as it is considered better adapted to the climate than the winter wheat. The worm in the head (Cecidomyia tritici,) improperly called weevil, has prevailed there to such an extent for several years, that this crop has been considered quite uncertain. This insect has, however, been less destructive during the last two years, and from all the accounts we have seen, the yield of wheat in that section has been generally good the past season. In the eastern part of this State, (New York,) the insect above mentioned, injured the winter wheat to some extent, but in the Genesee Valley and the great wheat districts of the State, the crop was good. In northern Indiana, northern Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin, the fly (Cecidomyia destructor,) did much injury to the crop—in many instances occasioning almost a total failure—and we are informed that this enemy has already made its appearance in great force, in the early fall-sown wheat. In the southerly part of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, wheat in many cases did not fill well. The growth of straw was very great, but the prevalence of warm, wet weather occasioned much of it to fall down or rust. This is quite generally the case on rich land. On the uplands of not so rich a quality, the crop was better and the grain plumper and heavier. Taking the Western States together, however, we think the wheat crop did not give an average yield per acre, though from the large quantity of ground sown, the aggregate product was not probably less than any previous year. So of the country at large; there was, probably, as much wheat produced the past season as in any former one.

INDIAN CORN.—Although this crop did not appear as promising in the fore part of the season, owing to the coldness and backwardness of the spring, yet the mild and favorable weather of the latter part of the summer so well matured the plant, that the yield has generally been an uncommonly good one. In the Northern and Eastern States, as well as in Canada, we feel justified in stating, that so good a crop has not been generally got for several years. This is a crop of very great consequence to all sections of the country, and for home consumption, is undoubtedly of more value, every thing considered, than any other kind of grain. Well has it been said by a distinguished agricultural writer, that it is "meal, meadow, and manure." The grain affords a most wholesome and nutritive food for man and beast, the stalk and leaf afford, when properly cured, a most excellent fodder for cattle; in fact, from no grain crop can so great an amount of sustenance be raised per acre, and from none can so good a return be given to the land in the shape of manure.

OATS.—This, as a grain crop, may be considered as entitled to rank next to the preceding in importance. As food for horses, especially those which are employed in quick work, oats are preferable to any other grain, and constitute the most convenient food which can be given. The yield this year is generally good, in most sections.

RYE AND BARLEY.—These are less cultivated than any other grain. In some neighborhoods, barley might be cultivated more largely to good advantage. On soils to which it is well adapted, it will produce from forty to fifty bushels per acre. The straw is excellent fodder for sheep and cattle.

HAY.—In the easterly part of Massachusetts, and some other sections, we have complaints that the crop of hay was much cut off by drouth, but taking the country together, we think the crop was at least an average one, though the quality may not be so good.

POTATOES.—This crop has suffered much in many districts from the epidemic which seems to be overspreading this country, as well as the old world. Considerable alarm is justly excited from the prevalence of this disease. To the northern portion of this country, as well as to a large portion of Europe, the potatoe crop cannot be considered of less value than any other. It has become an important article of human sustenance among all classes. By the rich it is prized as a wholesome and palatable article of diet, while to the poor it is indispensable—affording more sustenance in proportion to the expense of production, or to a given extent of land, than any other crop. Where it has not been effected by disease, the crop of the past season has been generally a good one.

FRUIT.—We do not recollect any year in which the different fruits have been so abundant and of so fine a quality, as the last. The various stone fruits, particularly plums, have been uncommonly plenty and good. This may be in a great degree owing to the disappearance of the curculio, which for several years has been so deadly an enemy to this description of fruits. Apples are generally plenty. From Maine and New Hampshire, we hear that the best kinds are almost a drug. We should suppose they might be exported to good advantage. We believe the apples of that region are generally found to keep better than most others, and are well liked in the southern markets. What better article can the farmers of Maine turn their attention to, than good winter apples for exportation?

THE NEW TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

The Secretary of War proposes to establish a new Territory, at the Eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, on the head waters of the Platte and the Arkansas, to be called the Territory of NEBRASKA. We believe this is the Indian name of the Platte river. This territory would be on our own acknowledged soil, and would command the grand pass between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. Near this spot rise the lofty peaks of the northern Andes, around whose brows circle perpetual snows. On either side roll down the waters which mingle with the Gulf of Mexico on this side—with the Gulf of California on the south-west, and with the broad Pacific, as it washes the western coast of America.

The advantages of this position, in a military or colonial point of view, are immense. It would make the journey of the emigrants West, comparatively easy. They would have both defence and rest. In case of inteference from foreign powers, the troops of the nation would be ready to descend either on the South, or on the Pacific outlets of Oregon, or move on the British territories of the North. It is the central position of the North American Continent, marked out by the God of nature as remarkable, by the magnificence of its mountains, its streams, and its extent! Whoever possesses and brings up future generations on this high central plateau, will be unconquerable in position and energy.

The Secretary also recommends a chain of military posts on our own territory, extending from Missouri to the Rocky Mountains.

PRACTICAL NON-RESISTANCE.

We have been told the following anecdote. Some years ago, a swaggering sailor was making his way along one of the streets of New York, in a mode of merry mischief, when he chanced to meet an elderly colored woman on the sidewalk, who was very sedately smoking her pipe. Our tar, none too sober, thought he would give the old woman a touch of his politeness. So he turned aside, gave her a hunch, and knocked her pipe out of her mouth. He waited with evident amusement to see the poor woman gather up the pieces. But what was his astonishment to hear her meekly say—"God forgive you, my son, as I do!" His generous heart was instantly smitten with mingled emotions of shame and admonition. He rushed towards her, exclaiming, "God bless you, good mother! I am sorry! Here, take my arm; let me walk with you. I would not be ashamed to walk with you through the whole city!" Then recollecting that this token of respect would be useless to her, he suddenly drew out of his pocket an extravagant handful of "change," which he compelled her to receive, and walked on with a repeated "God bless you, good mother!" Thus this despised negress, with a heart full of benevolence and self control, overcame evil with good. With a meek look, and a single forgiving sentence, she subdued the spirit of mischievous insolence, touching the finer chords of a weather-beaten soul, secured a willing repentance, and drew forth an artless response of benevolence. [Pract. Christ.

A THOUGHT FOR PARENTS.

A child beginning to read becomes delighted with a newspaper, because he reads of names and things which are very familiar, and he will make a progress accordingly. A newspaper in one year, (says Mr. Weeks,) is worth a quarter's schooling to a child, and every father must consider that substantial information is connected with advancement. The mother of a family, being one of its heads, and having a more immediate charge of children, should herself be instructed. A mind occupied becomes fortified against the ills of life, and is braced for any emergency. Children amused by reading or study are, of course, considerate, and more easily governed. How many thoughtless young men have spent their earnings in a tavern or grog shop, who ought to have been reading? How many parents who never spent twenty dollars for books for their families would have given thousands to reclaim a son or daughter who had ignorantly and thoughtlessly fallen into temptation.

JOHN KNOX'S HOUSE.—In the narrow street called the Netherbow, Edinburgh, stands the house of the reformer Knox. In this house he lived for many years, here he died, and out of that little balcony he is said often to have addressed the assembled people. A small stone effigy of Knox is still to be seen at the corner of the wall, and near it are cut the words "Deus—God." Strange to say, this house is now a gin-shop, and as it was in the evening that I entered it, I had great difficulty in making my way through the crowd of noisy dramdrinkers who filled its intricate little rooms and passages. If old John Knox could return to the Netherbow, he would have abominations and desecrations against which to launch his thunders, quite as bad as those of superstition and popery. If the Edinburgh magistrates have not authority enough to chase gin-drinkers and their profanations from the house once sanctified by the life and death of a great reformer, they ought at least to remove from its walls the old effigy and inscription which form so reproachful a contrast to its use and condition. [Kohl's Scotland.

ROBBERY.—During the sitting of the National Lord's Day Convention on Wednesday, the house being much crowded, some scoundrels managed to mingle among the audience, and to pick the pockets of three gentlemen of their pocket books. The last robbery was committed after night, in the abstraction of a pocket-book containing forty dollars, from the pocket of the Rev. Mr. Mitchell, while he was engaged in taking up the collection to defray the expenses of publishing the proceedings.

IMPORTING GERMAN CHILDREN.—Large numbers of German children are imported into England, by a set of persons who employ them to their own advantage, but who, beyond the purposes of money-making, care nothing for them. This mercenary and disgraceful proceeding has attracted the notice of an English clergyman, Rev. Louis Cappel, who has sought the interposition of the government, to prevent this cruel system of importation. But he has been told that the evil cannot be cured in England, but only in Germany, where it is necessary for every individual who leaves the country to obtain a passport. Poor German parents readily consent, for small sums of money, to give up their children, and these heartless speculators can find those who are base enough to go about in their employ and gather up children for the English trade. Such statements seem hardly credible, and yet we find the facts in a late number of a highly respectable English journal. [Boston Recorder.

A Gallician Jew, of the name of Mohr, has published a life of Baron Rothschild in Hebrew, which he has entitled "Glory to Israel, Biography of Baron Rothschild." This is a promising title, and the text does not disappoint expectation. M. Mohr declares in the course of his narrative, that up to the present time there are only three great men among the chosen people of God—Moses, David, and Rothschild.

The Lady's Book says that somebody once robbed the poet Montgomery of an inkstand, presented to him by the ladies of Sheffield. The public execration was so loud, that the thief restored the booty with the following note:

BIRMINGHAM, March, 1812.

"Honored Sir,—When we robbed your house, we did not know that you wrote such beautiful verses as you do. I remember my mother told some of them to me when I was a boy. I found what house we robbed, by the writing on the inkstand. Honored Sir, I send it back; it was my share of the booty, and I hope you and God will forgive me."

It is almost always easy to cure a child of stuttering, if a right method is adopted. Never hurry the child in speech, and if he begins to speak stammeringly, impose upon him strict silence, until he can utter the words smoothly. The remedy is a little severe at first, but an almost "certain cure."

WOMAN'S ATTRACTION

BY PROF. LONGFELLOW

What I most prize in woman
Is her affection—not her intellect.
Compare me with the great men of earth—
What am I? Why, a pigmy among giants!
But if thou lovest—mark me, I say lovest—
The greatest of thy sex excels thee not.
The world of affection is THY world—
Not that of man's ambition. In that stillness
Which most becomes a woman—calm and holy;
Thou sittest by the fireside of the heart,
Feeding its flame. The element of fire
Is pure. It cannot change its nature:
But burns as brightly in a gipsy camp,
As in a palace hall.

FASHIONABLE DANCING.

BY DR. WM. ALCOTT.

Those who have read "The Young Man's Guide," the "Young Woman's Guide," the "Young Wife," &c., are already acquainted with the general views of the writer concerning dancing, in itself considered. They know well, that as an amusement for the young, in certain circumstances, I attach to it great value; and that could it be redeemed from the service of Satan, and brought into the service of a better Master, I should be greatly unwilling to part with it. They will not therefore suspect me of an unreasonable prejudice against this exercise, like that which is supposed to be cherished in the breasts of some individuals. They will hear me, as I trust, candidly and patiently.

With the more fashionable modern dances—waltzing, the Polka dance, &c —I have never been particularly acquainted. I have indeed had some knowledge of the former—enough to lead to strong objections in my mind against it. Of the latter, I have only heard persons speak. A medical gentleman in Boston, a few days since—one who is not likely to be unreasonably fastidious—observed to me that he could not, as yet, hold up his head where it was going on; and that a friend of his assured him that only a year ago, in Paris, he should not have dared to mention it in well-bred company.

When I speak of fashionable dancing, however, I do not mean to refer to these outrages, as I deem them, upon Christianity and even civilization, but to the more common forms of dancing at balls, concerts, and assemblies. I refer to dancing, in large and often promiscuous companies, in the evening, and very late. Had dancing been confined to small collections of near neighbors and particular friends, in the afternoon, and under the eye of parents or teachers, I do not believe that the general prejudice—if it deserves the name—which now exists against the thing itself, would ever have been raised. I do not believe reason or common sense would ever have cried out against the custom, among young students, young tailors, young milliners, or young shoemakers, of leaving their seats and joining, five or ten or fifteen minutes, in the quiet dance, at any time of the day, (observe, I do not say of the night,) when their nature demanded exercise. There would be no more harm in it than in so much ball-playing or battledore. Indeed it would be preferable to batiledore, because that does not give special relief to the portions of the system which in such cases most need it, while dancing does this.

I have alluded to what is usually called a prejudice existing in the minds of many against dancing. This dislike, moreover, has been more general among particular sects of Christians than elsewhere. It has even been considered by many as belonging to bigotry rather than Christianity, and the sects which have spoken against it have been stigmatized.

Now when we look the whole matter over, I greatly fear it will be found that this notion is not well founded. I fear it will be seen that the very sects of Christians who have been most hostile to dancing (as it is, not as it might be conducted,) are among the closest followers of Christ in other particulars. And I fear, too, that it will be found that the sects which, as a whole, continue to favor the public evening dance, and who—perhaps to make sectarian capital—cry out against the bigotry of those who have set themselves against it, are not, at least in every instance, among those which retain, in these days of degeneracy, the largest measure of vital piety.

But I will not dwell on this point too long. It was introduced with reluctance, and will be dismissed with great joy. All I intended by it was to place the subject of dancing on the right ground. I need not be accused of sectarian partialities, certainly not in the direction which the foregoing remarks would seem to indicate. I conclude this part of my subject, therefore, by saying that there is every reason to believe the time to be at hand, when these very sects alluded to—whatever else they may retain which is or is not unscriptural—will be honored for this evidence of attachment to the purity of the Gospel, and for this very adherence to the faith once delivered to the saints.

It is enough to sit up late, in the quiet of home, in a world like this, of excitement and depravity. It is enough for the child of God to feel the ordinary temptations of life, at the hour of fever and mania, without being exposed to extraordinary ones. For I need not stop here to show that at the earliest hour of repose every person is more or less feverish, and beside himself. What, then, shall be said of midnight hours, and hours still later? What must be the result when we add to the pile already burning, other combustibles?

It would be easy to show, on the principles both of philosophy and physiology, that if bodily exercise were to be resorted to at an hour when rest is demanded, dancing, for that hour, is among the worst which could be named. If the devil himself, to carry out best his purposes, were to select, he could not make a better. He could not, I mean, even if he had no special agents—no sub-demons—to aid him in carrying out his plan. But are we sure of none of these? Who is the parent, who the master, who the brother—the sister—that shall guarantee an immunity from these fiends in human shape? [Adv. Moral Reform.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

SAMUEL RUSSEL,
President of the Board of Trustees

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM owes its rise to the liberality of Sir Hans Sloane, who had, during a long period of practice as a physician, accumulated a considerable library of books and manuscripts, together with a rare collection of objects of natural history and works of art. By his will, he directed that these should be offered to Parliament after his death, on condition of its providing a proper depository for them, and paying to his representatives about $100,000 for what had cost him $250,000. The offer was readily accepted in 1753, and an appropriation was also made for the purchase of the Harleian Library of Manuscripts. It was likewise directed, that the Cottonian Library should be added to these, and that the whole should form one General Collection for public use. A noble edifice, which formerly belonged to the house of Montague, was purchased as a repository; and the appropriate national title of the "BRITISH MUSEUM" was given to the new but already large and promising institution. The collection has since been increased by donations from many liberal antiquaries or naturalists, and by purchases with the appropriations of Parliament, until it now stands as a proud and unrivaled monument of the nation's taste and progress.

The institution is naturally divided into two distinct departments. One department consists of a series of galleries for exhibiting specimens of natural history, fossils, petrifactions, and an incalculable variety of antiquities and curiosities. The other department is the Reading Room and Library, containing some five hundred thousand works, collected from every age, and treating of every subject. The exhibition rooms are open through the day to visitors of all classes, without respect to birth or condition; and it is difficult to conceive of a more gratifying sight, than to see those extensive saloons crowded as they often are with the old and the young, the rich and the poor, gazing with wonder and admiration upon that vast collection of the curiosities of nature and art. The reading room of the library is open through the day, but only to such as have tickets of admission, which are easily obtained by application in writing, accompanied by a satisfactory recommendation. These tickets are granted without fee, and continue in force for six months, after which they are renewed for a similar period if no abuse be made of the privilege—the arrangement being adopted simply as a protection against unworthy and dangerous intruders.

A visit to the Museum ought not to occupy less than a day, and might profitably occupy weeks. On entering the gate, a quadrangle presents itself, the interior of which contains some old relics, and the side buildings of which are allotted to the dwellings of the officers. In the hall of entrance stands a splendid marble statue of Shakspeare, and near by is a curious image, surrounded by sculptured figures of dancing girls and minstrels, said to have been found in the bottom of the Ganges. The great staircase, by which you ascend to the upper floor, is lined with statues and curiosities. The first room of the upper floor contains dresses, warlike instruments, and household furniture, from all parts of the world, arranged in cases; and in the middle window, enclosed by a glazed frame, is one of the originals of Magna Charta. The next three rooms are devoted to collections of dried plants. Passing these, you enter the Mammalia Saloon, from which the eye has a view of a long series of Galleries devoted to specimens of Natural History. The walls of the Galleries are high, and lined with cases in which are arranged the collection of Birds, while table cases are neatly disposed in different parts of each room, containing birds' eggs and shells. Many portraits of distinguished individuals are likewise suspended from the walls. Adjoining one of the Zoological Galleries, are several rooms appropriated to a collection of minerals and organic remains. From these you proceed to the Gallery of Antiquities, occupying several rooms, in which are found curious pieces of Greek and Roman sculpture, bas-reliefs, sepulchral antiquities, etc. The Egyptian Saloon contains almost an endless variety of articles from Egypt serving to illustrate the ancient political, social, and religious condition of that country. To all of these must be added the rooms for Vases, Medals, and Prints, in each one of which may be found some of the most valuable specimens in existence. One day's examination will only give a vague impression of the extent of the Museum, and increase the anxiety to become familiar with its treasures.

A glance at the Reading Room of the Museum would well repay the visitor, though he might have but little time to avail himself of its benefits. It is a long high room, the walls of which are lined with cases containing books of reference, dictionaries, and encyclopedias. Through the center and along the sides of the room are aisles, and between these are rows of tables, each provided with chairs, and everything necessary for reading and copying. A large number of persons are constantly engaged in their labors here, as readers, transcribers, or book-makers. When a book is wanted, it must be found in the Catalogue, and a written order made out for it, giving the press mark, title of the work, size, place of publication, and date. Blanks for this purpose are always at hand, and when filled out and signed, they are given to one of the numerous librarians in attendance, by whom the book is brought to you as soon as the extent of the library will allow—the time seldom exceeding four or five minutes, although it may be necessary to pass through several rooms before reaching that which contains the desired work. When a book or manuscript is delivered, the ticket is retained, and the reader is held responsible for it so long as the ticket remains uncanceled. Persons are allowed to make short extracts at pleasure, but no considerable part of a manuscript can be transcribed without particular leave from the trustees. To take a book or manuscript out of the room, or to deface it by writing upon its pages, would be regarded as an abuse of the privilege, and might lead to unpleasant consequences. Every thing connected with the room is conducted in the most quiet and orderly manner, and persons may carry on their researches here with as little interruption as in their private studies. The benefits of an extensive library are thus furnished to many whose pecuniary resources will allow them to possess but few books. The library is receiving constant accessions by purchases and donations, as well as by a law requiring publishers to furnish it gratuitously with a copy of every work they issue. It is now the most extensive library in England, and, in connection with the other department of the Museum, it may justly be the pride of the nation.

THOUGHTS ON THE PERPETUITY OF THE SABBATH.

NUMBER THIRTEEN.

The pentecostal outpouring of the Holy Spirit did not affect the Sabbath time.

The total silence of the Holy Scriptures about a change of the Sabbath time, compels those who profess a scriptural authority for the observance of the first day as the Sabbath, to seek for some sanctifying circumstances in Scripture narrative. Hence they assume that the day of Pentecost, on which the Holy Spirit was given, was the first day of the week, and that this was designed to honor and sanctify the first day as a Sabbath. This is assumption, because it is not possible for any man to prove that Pentecost happened that year on the first day. The Holy Scriptures no where say so, or intimate any such thing. But had it been said it was on the first day, unless it had said likewise that it was to honor that day and sanctify it as a Sabbath, it would not be a fair inference that it was so designed, any more than that the descent of the Holy Spirit at the baptism of Christ was designed to sanctify the day on which he was baptized. This popular perversion of the Holy Scriptures, leads thousands of Christians to overlook one of the grandest facts in the book of God's revealed will, viz. that the ministry of the Apostles in the name of the Messiah to Jews and Gentiles, received an attestation from heaven similar to that of the ministry of Moses in the name of Jehovah. To Moses, Jehovah appeared in a burning bush; to the Apostles, in divided spiral flames of fire resting upon their heads. To Moses was given a mouth and wisdom for the work he was to engage in; to the Apostles, the gift of speaking different tongues, and wisdom which their adversaries could not gainsay. To Moses was given power to inflict divers plagues upon the Egyptians, confirming his mission in the name of Jehovah; to the Apostles, power to heal the sick and raise the dead in the name of Jesus of Nazareth. To Moses, Jehovah appeared while he was keeping sheep in the desert; to the Apostles, the Holy Spirit came as they waited for it in Jerusalem, according to their Master's direction. Its being on the day of Pentecost no more sanctified that day, than the appearance of the Shekinah to Moses sanctified that day on which he was keeping sheep.

There is, however, a very obvious reason for the day of Pentecost being chosen as the day on which the Holy Spirit should be given, although overlooked by those who are so anxious to find in it a Christian Sabbath. Our Saviour was put to death at the feast of the Passover, when all the male population were required to be present at Jerusalem. Behold, then, at Pentecost, the next great festival, when the whole population are gathered together at Jerusalem, he has ascended up into heaven, and according to his own promise sends down the Holy Spirit in the presence of the whole assembled nation. The reason why the day of Pentecost was chosen for this descent of the Holy Spirit, is intimated by the sacred historian, Acts 2: 5—"There were dwelling at Jerusalem devout men out of every nation under heaven." Hence the divinity of Jesus of Nazareth, and the truth of the Gospel, were attested before representatives out of every nation under heaven.

This, however, was not the only time when the Spirit was given to attest the truth of the Gospel doctrine. Acts 4: 31, records such a visitation of His power, that the place where they were assembled was shaken by it; and the power of the preached word was nearly double what it was on the day of Pentecost, for five thousand men believed. Acts 4: 4. Was this a Sabbath likewise?

Again, when the Gospel was carried to the house of Cornelius, (the first Gentile believer admitted to the same privileges as they of the circumcision,) Peter says, Acts 11: 15, "The Holy Spirit fell on them as on the disciples at the beginning," i. e. as on the day of Pentecost, in divided spiral flames. Was this a Sabbath too?

Thus did the Holy Spirit attest the truth and divinity of the Gospel of Jesus of Nazareth to both Jews and Gentiles, so that our faith stands not in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. How gross a perversion of the sacred narrative is it, to represent it as being given to sanction the keeping of the first day, when it says not a word respecting it! And when this is urged to the setting aside of the divine law, what is it but a species of that rebellion which is as the sin of witchcraft; i. e. an assumption of authority that belongs not to man? 2 Samuel 15: 22. S. D.

PERILS OF VICTORY.

"Ne'er think the vict'ry won,
Nor lay thine armor down:
Thy arduous work will not be done,
Till thou obtain thy crown."

Just before the battle of Waterloo, it was ascertained by Napoleon, that Blucher, the celebrated Prussian commander, was advancing to the aid of the British forces with an army of well-trained veterans. Buonaparte was exceedingly anxious to prevent a junction between Wellington and Blucher. Accordingly he despatched a strong corps under Marshall Grouchy, to check, and if possible defeat "the drunken old gambler," as he contemptuously called the Prussian General. Grouchy fell upon his prey and secured a signal victory; but thinking that the weariness of his troops demanded that rest should be afforded them, and that it would be easy to annihilate the shattered remains of the Prussian army on the succeeding day, he drew his men off the field, and ordered them to bivouac for the night. Morning came; but the Prussian and his disabled army had gone, and much to the mortification of Grouchy, had gained a good distance on the road to Waterloo. The French General pursued his wily foe, overtook him, and defeated him, and severely wounded the brave old Blucher. The action closed just at night-fall. Grouchy was persuaded, that under all the circumstances, there was not the least probability that his prize would again escape. Accordingly he allowed his men to sleep on their arms without completing the victory. But the morning sun disclosed Blucher, urging by threats and promises, his weary veterans along the road to Waterloo. The Frenchman again gave chase; once more overtook the Prussian, again defeated him; but for the third time neglected to follow up the blow by the capture of his enemy, expecting as before, to finish the conquest on the morrow. But under cover of the night old Blucher again escaped, hastened to the grand field, and arrived in time to participate in that mighty charge of England's chivalry which swept the flower of France before it, made Napoleon a homeless wanderer, and gave a new direction to the fortunes of Christendom. Grouchy came up in time to fly with his conquered master, and share in the shame of the most signal defeat which modern warfare has known.

The above historical incident illustrates forcibly a certain type of religious experience. The consecrated soul is often beset by Satan, with a fearful temptation. The tempted looks to Christ for aid, and receives it; the victory is gained, and the temptation resisted. But here a new difficulty arises. The conquest is apt to lull the soul into that "security which is mortals' chiefest enemy." Satan takes advantage of the moment, whispers in the ear which an instant before he was filling with torturing temptation—"The Devil is conquered; cry victory, and give God the glory." Alas! too often the deceived soul listens to the treacherous advice, and cries "victory" so vehemently that it forgets to be on the lookout for new trials, lets down its watch, and permits Satan to make a new assault, which proves successful.

Now it is the privilege of the child of God to rejoice in victory over sin, but it is no part of his privilege to carry his rejoicing so far that he shall thereby be betrayed into sin. No, while he is rejoicing, he should remember that he has new enemies to meet, and that the reward of victory is reserved for him alone who shall "endure unto the end." [Oberlin Evangelist.

REJECTION OF DIVINE TRUTH.

How unreasonable is it to reject any doctrine which is revealed to us in the Christian Scriptures, only because we are unable to comprehend how it can be! The words may be plain and evident, where the doctrines which they contain are mysterious; and how much safer, and wiser, and more befitting our present condition, it is to conclude, that these truths are proposed by the Author of light, to prove our humility and ready acquiescence to his will; to become subservient to the ends of religion by exercising the obedience of our reason, and probably in other ways, which at present we cannot perceive. It is not intended that we should know every thing in this present life; it is not agreeable to our notions of a state of trial that we should.

Many things we must at present take for granted upon the authority of God's word, nor is this any juster ground of complaint than it is, that a child is less acquainted with the reason of things than one of mature age. That man acts most agreeably to his character of an imperfect and erring creature, placed in a state of discipline, who first satisfies himself that the Scriptures are indeed what they profess to be, the word of God, and then takes in hand the sacred volume of truth with a humble and teachable mind, prepared to believe all that is therein commanded, because he there discovers the sure will of God, and the motives to obedience. That is to receive with meekness the ingrafted word. [Bishop of London.

PROFIT OF PERSECUTION.

God schooleth and nurtureth his people, that so, through many tribulations, they may enter into their rest. Frankincense, when it is put into the fire, smells the sweeter; the earth, when it is torn up with the plow, becomes more fruitful; the seed in the ground, after frost and snow, and winter storms, springs the ranker; the higher the vine is pruned to the stock, the greater grapes it yields; the grape, when it is most pressed and beaten, makes the sweetest wine; fine gold is better when it is cast into the fire; rough stones with hewing are squared, and made for a building; cloth is rent and cut that it may be made a garment; linen is bucked, and washed, and wrung, and beaten, and is the fairer. These are familiar examples to show the benefit and advantage which the children of God receive by persecution. [Bishop Jewell.

A BOLD PREACHER.

The boldness of Samuel Davies, (a qualification so important that even St. Paul requested the Christians to pray it might be given him,) will be illustrated by a single anecdote. When President of Princeton College, he visited England for the purpose of obtaining donors for that institution. The King (George II.,) had a curiosity to hear a preacher from the "wilds of America." He accordingly attended, and was so struck with his commanding eloquence that he expressed his astonishment so loud as to be heard half way over the house, in such terms as these: "he is a wonderful man!" "Why, he beats my bishops!" &c. Davies observing that the King was attracting more attention than himself, paused, and looking his Majesty full in the face, gave him, in an emphatic tone, the following beautiful rebuke—"When the lion roareth, let the beasts of the forest tremble: and when the Lord speaketh, let the kings of the earth keep silence." The King instantly shrunk back in his seat like a schoolboy, that had been rapped over the head by his master, and remained quiet during the remainder of the sermon. The next day the monarch sent for him, and gave him fifty guineas as a donation for the institution over which he presided, observing at the same time to his courtiers, "He is an honest man." Not one of his silken bishops would have dared to give him such a reproof.

FAMILY PRAYER.

In a certain church, there were four brethren, heads of families, who were generally known to neglect this important social Christian duty. The subject being introduced at a church meeting, it was proposed to appoint a Committee to wait upon two of these brethren, and labor with them on this subject. When the Committee was nominated, who should be named, but the two other brethren who were known by many to be guilty of the same neglect. They tried to shift off the appointment and excuse themselves, without, however, stating the true reason of their reluctance; but it was all in vain, the vote was put, and these two were appointed the Committee. They were now in rather an awkward situation—pretty sort of persons, thought they, to be appointed to labor with others for the neglect of family prayer, when we are guilty of the same ourselves. The result, however, was good. The two brethren got together to talk the matter over, and concluded that they could not very well converse with the others till they had reformed themselves. After conversing together, and reflecting alone, they were each convicted of the guilt of their criminal neglect. They assembled their families, confessed to them their guilt, re-established at once the family altar, and the Lord came down and blessed their souls. They were then ready to go and converse with the other two delinquents; they told them how they had been equally guilty, how they had repented of their sinful neglect, and how the Lord had blessed them and their families in erecting afresh the broken down family altar, and entreated them to do the same. The consequence was, that family prayer was immediately re-established in these families also, and at the next church meeting, the Committee reported with tears in their eyes, that they had been successful in reclaiming not only their brethren, but also themselves, from the guilt and the inconsistency of those professedly Christian heads of families who call not upon the name of the Lord. [Christian Watchman.

RUNNING AWAY FROM PRAYER.

Two gentlemen coming northward sailed to S—— in the same vessel with an agent of the American Tract Society, who invoked a blessing at table, and called upon God in morning and evening prayer. Their consciences were ill at ease. When they arrived at S—— they took passage for New York in a commodious vessel; but finding that the praying man had engaged his passage in the same vessel, they left and sailed on board a vessel that was greatly crowded, and where they were compelled to lodge upon the cabin-floor. To their confusion and amazement they found a pious minister among their fellow-passengers, who prayed as earnestly and proclaimed the truth as boldly as the one from whom they had escaped. They had "jumped from the frying-pan into the fire." If all ministers and Christians would let their light shine wherever thrown in the providence of God, few ungodly men on the land or on the ocean would be permitted to live at ease until they repented of sin and trusted in Christ.

MONEY.

It is astonishing how much the Bible says of money. The characters of men are more thoroughly developed by money than by any other means. It is the hottest crucible in which a man's soul can be placed. See how the Bible speaks of it. Man is a steward. Nothing that he possesses is his own. The fee simple of not a foot of land lies in him. It lies in the throne of God, and the occupier is nothing but a tenant—a mere tenant at will—bound to use every penny of his estate for God's glory, and to render a strict account at last. What light does Christ's own conduct throw upon this doctrine. Men pride themselves in their wealth; did Christ? Where was he born, and how did he live? And when upon his cross, how did he act towards his mother, the being of all others of the race whom he best loved? Did he say to Joseph of Arimathea, "Behold thy mother?" No, no! It was to John, the poor, penniless disciple, to whom he commended her. He who could have commanded the mountains to pour forth their riches for her use, bequeathed his dearest earthly relative to the care of a portionless son—thus throwing a signal rebuke upon those who will not trust God, parting with their substance at his command. Let this elementary work be thoroughly done. Let the great doctrine of stewardship be preached. Let men know the tenure by which they hold their property. Then if the Master calls for a given sum, whether by agents, circulars, or any other cry, the means will be forthcoming; and a man will withhold it on the peril of his soul. [Rev. Dr. Patton.

EDUCATION IN GERMANY AND AMERICA.

The two most strongly contrasted cases which can be found, are probably those of Germany and the United States. In the United States, it is well known, a provision for university education is made as ample as that of schools for an earlier age: yet no one pretends that a highly finished education is to be looked for in that country. The cause is obvious. In a young nation, the great objects of life are entered upon earlier, and every preparatory process is gone through in a more superficial manner. Seats of learning are numerous and fully attended, both in Germany and America, and they testify in each to a pervading desire of knowledge. Here the agreement ends. The German student, may, without being singular, remain within the walls of his college till time silvers his hairs; or he has even been known to pass eighteen years without crossing the threshold of his study. The young American, meanwhile, satisfied at the end of three years that he knows as much as his neighbors, settles in a home, engages in farming or commerce, and plunges into what alone he considers the business of life. Each of these pursues his appropriate objects: each is right in his own way; but the difference of pursuit indicates a wider difference of sentiment between the two countries than the abundance of the means of learning in each indicates a resemblance. The observer must therefore mark not only what and how easy are the seats of learning, but who frequent them, whether there are many, past the season of youth, who make study the business of their lives; or whether all are of that class who regard study merely as a part of the preparation, which they are ordained to make for the accomplishment of the commonest aims of life. He can scarcely take his evening's walk in the precincts of a university without observing a difference as wide as this. The great importance of the fact lies in this—that increase of knowledge is necessary to secure the enlargement of freedom. Germany may not, it is true, require learning in her youth for political purposes, but because learning has become the taste, the characteristic honor of the nation: but this knowledge will infallibly work out, sooner or later, her political regeneration. America requires knowledge in her sons because her political existence itself depends upon their mental competency. The two countries will probably approximate gradually towards a sympathy which is at present out of the question. As America becomes more fully peopled, a literature will grow up within her, and study will assume its place among the chief objects of life. The great ideas which are the employment of the best minds of Germany must work their way out into action; and new and immediately practical kinds of knowledge will mingle themselves, more and more largely, with those to which she has been, in time past, devoted. The two countries may thus fall into a sympathetic correspondence on the mighty subject of human government and human learning, and the grand idea of liberty may be made more manifest in the one, and disciplined and enriched in the other. [Miss Martineau.

THE NEW BONNET.

"You'll be sure to send it home on Saturday, Mrs. Smith."

"Certainly, Miss Johnson; you may depend upon it."

"To be trimmed with pink, you remember, and not too full."

"Yes, ma'am, I will make it to suit you, or you may send it back."

And so the matter was left till Saturday evening, when a messenger came with a bandbox, and in the bandbox the bonnet for "Miss Amelia F. Johnson." It was examined and tried, first on one head, and then on another, and finally acknowledged on all hands to be very tasty, and quite becoming Miss J. It was talked about till bedtime; it was then dreamed about, and the first thought on Amelia's mind on Sunday morning was the new bonnet. But it rained all day! and it was a day of fretfulness and impatience to this giddy girl.

Another week passed, and a bright sun cheered the next Sunday morning, but Amelia was sick! She did not leave her bed all day; a violent fever seized upon her, and brought her near to the grave. As she lay upon her sick bed, she was led to think how foolish she had been to make so much of a new bonnet, and so little of the great end for which she was created.

The Sabbath Recorder.

NEW YORK, JAN. 2, 1844.

☞ Several valuable articles have of late appeared in our editorial columns over the signature *. They are from the pen of Rev. Thomas B. Brown. Our readers will rejoice to know that he has promised to afford frequent aid in this way.

THE TRUE ISSUE.

One of the greatest difficulties we have ever found in the Sabbath controversy, is to make our opponents understand what is the real question at issue. So long have their thoughts, feelings, and habits, been moulded under one particular view of the subject, that it seems almost a miracle if one is found who can disregard all foreign matter, and look at the precise point in debate long enough to come to any certain and intelligent conclusion about it. But it is evident, that if an opponent is suffered to raise false issues, or to be continually striking off into the discussion of some point which does not affect the final question, we may prolong the controversy ad infinitum.

Let us then endeavor to state distinctly what is, and what is not, the issue between us and the observers of the first day of the week.

1. The issue is not whether the first day of the week was observed at a very early period by Christians. We admit that it was. We admit that its observance may be traced up to very near the borders of the apostolic age. What more can a generous, conscientious opponent, who scorns any other aid than what the truth will give him, ask? He knows in his own soul, that this is the very utmost that can be produced from any of his histories. Let him ransack his old musty volumes all the way backward, till he fancies he can almost talk to "the beloved disciple," face to face, and what more can he find? Verily nothing.

But when you have got this admission from us, then we have another question to ask. How—don't dodge the question—HOW was the day observed by the early Christians? We admit the observance of it; but that is not the issue. The issue respects the manner of observing it. You, if you are consistent, will say that the early Christians observed it not only by public worship, but by abstaining from labor. We, on the other hand, deny that they abstained from labor. We admit that they held public worship; but—we repeat it—we deny that they abstained from labor. We deny that they regarded it as a Sabbath, "resting according to the commandment." Now with the issue thus fairly stated, we put the laboring oar into your hands, and challenge you to prove your position. Bring proof, if you can, that the early Christians regarded the first day of the week as any thing else than a religious festival; between which and a Sabbath there is a very important difference, the latter requiring abstinence from labor, the former merely requiring public worship in honor of the event commemorated, and allowing the rest of the day to be spent in labor or amusement.

2. When it is once settled, that in a very early period of the church the first day was observed as a festival; when our opponents have fairly jaded themselves to a "weariness of the flesh," in their "much study" of the old fathers, to find proof of it;—though we never called it in question;—then the issue is, whether this festival was ordained by Christ?—whether the New Testament furnishes inspired example of such festival? Our opponents affirm; we deny. We maintain that in every passage of the New Testament where the first day of the week is mentioned, the context furnishes a sufficient reason why it is mentioned, without the least necessity of supposing it to have been a festival season. No exception can be made to this, unless in regard to 1 Cor. 16: 2. The reason why the Apostle in this place specifies the first, rather than any other day of the week, does not so clearly appear from the context; but the peculiar phraseology employed, "let each one of you lay by him," [himself,] is against the idea of any public meeting; and if no public meeting, of course no festival season. As every allusion to the first day of the week is sufficiently explained by other circumstances noticed in the context, the inferential proof of its festival character is thereby destroyed. As for clear, positive proof of it, such as express precept or command, no person of modesty pretends it. Still less is there any proof of its Sabbatic character.

3. Another point wherein we are necessarily at issue with great numbers of Christians, is whether the institution of the Sabbath is separable from the particular day to be observed. They affirm; we deny. We maintain that God's blessing and sanctifying a particular day, is the very thing in which the institution consists. To render this plain matter yet more plain, we invite close attention to the wording of the fourth commandment; premising, however, that the word Sabbath is not translated from a Hebrew word, but is the Hebrew word itself anglicised, just as baptism is an anglicized Greek word. The proper translation of the word is Rest. Now let the word Rest be substituted for Sabbath, and how clear it becomes—

"Remember the Rest-day to keep it holy. [Surely some particular day is denoted; for it is THE rest day, not A rest day.] Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Rest of the Lord thy God. [Is it any where historically recorded as a fact, that God rested on THE seventh day? It is. Gen. 2: 2. 'On the seventh day God rested from all his work which he had made.' Who does not see that that day on which God rested, was the last of the seven which constituted the first week of time?] In it [IN WHAT? why, in the seventh day, the last day of the week; for the pronoun it can have no other antecedent]—thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor the stranger that is within thy gates. [WHY must no work be done in that particular day, the seventh or last day of the week? The reason follows.] For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and RESTED on the seventh day, [as the record in Gen. 2: 2, proves. See also Heb. 4: 4.] Wherefore the Lord blessed the Rest-day, and sanctified it."

The conclusion is irresistible, that the Rest-day spoken of is the particular day on which God rested from his work, which, as before shown, was the last day of the week. That very day, and no other, God blessed and sanctified. The only reason assigned why he sanctified it, is "because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made." Gen. 2: 3. The Rest-day, then, which we are required to observe, is "the Rest of the Lord thy God:" which does not mean the rest which the Lord thy God has appointed, though it is true that he has appointed it; nor does it mean a rest which becomes the Lord's by reason of our appropriating it to him; but "the rest of the Lord thy God" means THE REST WHICH THE LORD THY GOD OBSERVED.

Now from all this we think it must be evident, that whoever observes any other Rest-day than the seventh day of the week, does not observe the Rest—Sabbath—"of the Lord thy God." He may, it is true, appropriate it to the Lord his God, and in that sense call it the Lord's; he may ignorantly suppose that Christ in the Gospel has appointed it, and in that sense also call it the Lord's; but it can by no means be called "the Rest of the Lord thy God" in the sense of that expression in the fourth commandment. Hence, irresistible is our conviction, that he does not obey the commandment. O brother Christian, why will you persist in maintaining that your Sunday-keeping is an act of obedience to the law of the Sabbath?

In view of what we have offered, it is clear that the Sabbath grows out of, and is the necessary result of the blessing put upon a particular day. The Sabbath is not first instituted by itself, as some erroneously suppose, and then the day designated; but the day is first "blessed and sanctified," and that makes the institution. One cannot help wondering, therefore, where President Humphrey's reason could have been, when he penned the following: "According to the first clause of the commandment, it is the Sabbath day which we are to remember; and so at the close, it was the Sabbath which was hallowed and blessed, and not the seventh day." NOT the seventh day! Pray, was not the seventh day the Rest-day? And are not Rest-day and Sabbath-day synonymous terms? What then can you mean, Dr. H., by saying that "the fourth commandment is so expressed, as to admit of a change in the day, without at all affecting the sacred institution itself?" *

SOUTH-WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

We have received a manuscript copy of the Minutes of the SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST SOUTH-WESTERN ASSOCIATION, from which we collect the following facts:—

The Association convened with the church in Jackson, Shelby Co., O., Oct. 9, 1844. Eld. J. Hill preached the introductory discourse; R. C. Bond was chosen moderator, and Eli. Forsythe and J. Hill, Clerks. The statistics of the churches show some additions, but indicate a low state of religion. An amendment of the Constitution was agreed to, pointing out more specifically the Treasurer's duties. Joel Green and Lewis Bond were appointed a Committee to visit the church in New Salem, Va., to assist in reconciling difficulties. R. C. Bond was appointed a delegate to the General Conference, and L. A. Davis delegate to the Western Association. R. C. Bond was appointed an agent to preach on the subject of the Sabbath. It was reported, on behalf of the Missionary Committee, that R. C. Bond had labored among the churches since February last, under an appointment from the Missionary Association; had spent 122 days, traveled 1572 miles, preached 98 sermons. A plan for missionary operations during the coming year was adopted, recommending that the Association be divided into two districts, the Ohio river being the line of division; and that the churches in each district be requested to raise money to support a missionary. An Executive Committee for each district was appointed to carry out the plan. A resolution was passed to divide the Association, making the Ohio river the line of division—this to take effect after the next annual session.

The report on the State of Religion speaks of the declension in the churches, but expresses a hope of improvement. The Circular Letter is upon the duty of separating ourselves from the world, and urges the necessity of greater consecration. The Corresponding Letter expresses satisfaction at the degree of union which exists, and a desire to advance the cause with which we are identified.

After a session of three days, the Association adjourned to meet with the Church in New Salem, Va., on the first day of the week before the second Sabbath in October, 1845.

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

The accounts received from the Sandwich Islands are of an exceedingly encouraging character. In no other part of the world have such remarkable changes been wrought in so short a period—changes which show that the Gospel is the pioneer of civilization and refinement. The Attorney General of Hawaii was lately from this country, through whose instrumentality in part all the proceedings of the government are strictly conformed to the rules of law and etiquette in civilized monarchies. The civil and criminal codes are to be modeled after the codes of the United States, England, and France. A limited number of foreigners are employed in the high offices of the State, until the chiefs are educated to fill the different stations of responsibility—each foreigner being required to take the oath of allegiance to the King and Constitution. In addition to these, quite a number are settling there to engage in commerce, agriculture, and the mechanic arts. Many improvements are going on; and Honolulu may yet become the Genoa of the Pacific.

From the New York Evangelist of Dec. 26.

CHRISTMAS.

Christmas—the name which this day bears is instructive. Christ-mass, that is, the day on which is wont to be celebrated the idolatrous Romish sacrifice of the mass, in honor of the birth of Christ. As nearly as can be now ascertained, the day was first set apart for this purpose by the authority of the bishop or pontiff at Rome, toward the close of the fourth century.

The following reasons may be assigned for its not being religiously observed by Protestants:

1. We do not acknowledge the authority of its appointment. If the religious observance of Christmas was divinely enjoined upon us, or if we had the slightest evidence in the writings of the apostles that they observed it, or that they taught the churches which they established to do so, then we should feel ourselves obliged to observe the day; but as Protestants, we long ago abjured the authority of the Pope of Rome, and we still utterly repudiate his right to legislate for us, either over our consciences or our conduct.

It was an essential principle of the Reformation, which we hold to have been sound, and the only principle which in the circumstances could have been safe, to reject everything whatever which appeared manifestly to be of human contrivance, and to carry the church back, both in its doctrines and its practice, to the incorrupt simplicity of the apostolic times.

But it is sometimes asked, What possible objection can there be to the religious observance of Christmas? That most salutary principle of the Reformation which has been named, is a sufficient objection. If we once begin to overburthen the church with observances not divinely appointed, we open a door to universal license, and no man can tell what the end will be.

But it is still urged, with a show of more than ordinary piety, "It seems so very proper to celebrate the birth of our blessed Saviour." Yes, indeed, but it will not do for us to multiply observances merely because they seem proper. In a less degree, it would seem proper to celebrate the births of Moses, and Peter, and Paul, and many other worthies. If our judgment of propriety is to be the rule rather than the Scriptures, there is no safety. We must adhere to the principles of the Reformation, and stand by the word of God, or we get at once in the old highway of Romish corruption. That is a dangerous path to tread in, and the true wisdom is to keep out of it altogether.

2. A second reason is, that it is not known that Christ was born on the 25th of December. We have seen somewhere a very labored and arrogantly learned effort to prove that Christmas is the veritable day of his birth; but the truth is, that no one knows, and no honest man pretends to know, on what day that event transpired. In the Greek church, it is celebrated on the 6th of January, and we see no reason for supposing that this is not as near the mark as the 25th of December. Although, therefore, if the precise day was known, we might assent, perhaps, to the propriety of bestowing some special notice upon it, we cannot now see the propriety even of celebrating our Lord's birth on one day more than on another. And this, we suspect, leads to the true doctrine on this subject, that Christians ought to celebrate the unspeakable gift of God every day in the year.

We suppose, that if it had been God's design that the especial event of the birth of his son should be memoralized in the church by an annual holy-day, he would have taken care by his providence, that the day should not be lost. It was his design that the day on which Jesus rose from the dead should be observed as the Christian Sabbath, and we are therefore particularly informed that the event transpired on the first day of the week. But the inspired historian, in introducing the account of our Lord's birth, approaches no nearer to a designation of the time than this, "And it came to pass in those days," &c. &c. Luke 2: 1.

3. We object to the observance of Christmas by the church, because we believe that its original appointment as a Christian festival was not only unauthorized but wicked.

It was foisted in among the observances of religion, along with many other things for which there can be imagined no reason but a willingness to make a compromise with heathenism. The facts were simply these. The sagacity of the Romish church was not long in making the profound discovery that the chief obstacle in the way of an easy and universal embrace of Christianity, was the world's natural dislike of the simplicity and purity of its doctrines and practice. The old heathens of the Empire were very loath to abandon their voluptuous and flesh-pleasing system for one which offered so little in return to gratify their appetite for display and self-indulgence. To the ecclesiastical Solomons of that time, the idea occurred that the work of conversion might be facilitated by rendering Christianity more attractive in its form, and more agreeable to the popular tastes; in a word, by compromising the matter, and carrying the gospel at least half-way in the work of conformation, to meet the reluctant idolaters. They had been accustomed to gorgeous temples, pompous ceremonials, a splendidly attired priesthood, and numerous holiday and festival occasions. Reasoning, therefore, as many reason now for Christmas, that it is proper, and not in the least objectionable, the authorities of the Romish church thought that it was highly proper, and not in the least objectionable, to alter and amend the Christian system so as to render it more palatable to the people. We do not charge them with intentional wickedness, but with a gross error of judgment, into which they could not have fallen if they had a proper reverence for the word of God, and just ideas of the spirituality of true religion. Unhappily, the doctrine had already obtained among them, that the Scriptures were not the only rule of faith and practice, and the spirituality of religion was already entirely lost by the great body of professors. Under such auspices, the work of emendation advanced rapidly. Christian churches swelled into vast and magnificent temples. In the place of the few and simple rites of the apostolic times, august and imposing ceremonies were multiplied. The unpretending garb of the first preachers was laid aside for splendid priestly robes, and every imaginable occasion was seized upon for pomps, processions and festivals. To make the transition yet easier for the people, many of the principal festivals were appointed for the very days on which they had been accustomed to celebrate the festivals of the old religion, and were directed to be kept with the same observances. So it was with Christmas. The old Romans, at the end of their Saturnalia, which began on the 19th of December, had been in the habit of celebrating on the 25th of that month their feast in honor of the birth of Sol. On that occasion they brought garlands and branches of evergreen from the woods to deck the temple and altars of their God, and came together tumultuously to conclude the Saturnalian orgies with greater excess of riot. This was the day fixed upon for the Christian feast in honor of the birth of Christ, and that the change might not appear material, the practice was retained of adorning the churches with bows of evergreen, and of making Christmas, in connection with religions worship, a day of special hilarity, and so it has come down to the present time, fun, frolic, evergreens and all!

Now we have no objection to Christmas, viewed simply as a holiday. Perhaps, regarded merely in its social aspect, under proper restrictions, it is well enough. We need, perhaps, one or two such seasons in the course of the year, when, without the sacred restraints of the Sabbath, we may relax the stern formalities of every day life, and all become children together. The 25th of December will do for one such season as well as any other day, but for the reason that have been named, we cannot attach the least degree of sacredness to it, and we think the observance of it, in a religious way, as practiced by authority, decidedly improper.

Remarks upon the foregoing.

It is not uncommon for men, in advocating some position which they wish to establish, or opposing some doctrine which they wish to overthrow, to lay down principles, which, if applied to their own practice, would unavoidably condemn them. The foregoing article seems to us a striking illustration of this inconsistency. The Evangelist is known to be zealous in opposing all the holidays of the Catholic and Episcopal Churches, and equally zealous in advocating the observance of the Lord's Day. But, if we mistake not, the objections here raised against Christmas apply equally against the Lord's Day, and would require him who rejects the one to reject the other also. Let us see.

1. The first objection is against the authority of the Roman Church to appoint days of religious observance—it being an essential principle of the Reformation that the Bible is the only rule in such matters. The early Reformers were consistent in the application of this principle. Hence they rejected Christmas-day, or the day of Christ's Nativity; Good-Friday, or the day of his Crucifixion; Easter-day, or the annual celebration day of his Resurrection; the Lord's-day, or the weekly celebration day of his Resurrection; Holy-Thursday, or the day of his Ascension; and Whitsunday, or the day of his sending down the Holy Ghost. They found no divine appointment of these days, and the principle which they had adopted swept them all away together. But their followers, instead of carrying out the principle, have rejected some of these holidays while they retain others, by which means they have exposed themselves to the charge of inconsistency, and "opened a door to universal license." For proof of this, we will bring but one witness, although many others are at hand. It is a Catholic Catechism, called "An Abridgment of the Christian Doctrine," in which we find the following:

> "Ques.—How prove you that the Church hath power to command feasts and holy-days?
> Ans.—By this act of changing the Sabbath into Sunday, which Protestants allow of; and therefore they contradict themselves by keeping Sunday so strictly, and breaking most other feasts commanded by the same church. Because, by keeping Sunday so strictly, they acknowledge the Church's power to ordain Sabbath, and to command them under sin, and by not keeping the feasts by her commanded, they again deny the same power."

2. The second objection is, that the day is not certainly known; and if it were, the propriety is not seen of celebrating our Lord's birth on one day more than on another. A very just objection, truly. But how a person who sees no propriety in celebrating the Lord's birth on a particular day, can at the same time see a propriety in celebrating his resurrection on a particular day, is a mystery to us. It is true, we are referred to the fact that "the first day of the week" is mentioned in connection with the resurrection, as though this indicated that the day was afterwards to be observed. But as the reference is made in reply to a Catholic objection, we will answer it by the following extract from a Catholic author of some repute:

> "The word of God commandeth the Seventh day to be the Sabbath of our Lord, and to be kept holy; you, Protestants, without any precept of Scripture, change it to the First day of the week, only authorized by our traditions. Divers English Puritans oppose against this point, that the observation of the first day is proved out of Scripture, where it is said the first day of the week, Acts 20: 7—1 Cor. 16: 2—Rev. 1: 10. Have they not spun a fair thread in quoting these places? If we should produce no better for purgatory, and prayers for the dead, invocation of saints, and the like, they might have good cause indeed to laugh us to scorn; for where is it written that these were Sabbath days in which those meetings were kept? Or where is it ordained they should be always observed? Or, which is the sum of all, where is it decreed that the observation of the first day should abrogate and abolish the sanctifying of the seventh day, which God commanded everlastingly to be kept holy? Not one of those is expressed in the written word of God."

3. The third objection is, that its original appointment as a Christian festival was not only unauthorized, but wicked. The facts referred to in proof of this assertion, are a mournful commentary upon the attempts of human wisdom to improve upon divine legislation. Such attempts may appear at first very unobjectionable, but they are often lamented when it is too late to prevent their evil consequences. It was so with the introduction of the Lord's day. What could be less objectionable, apparently, than to set apart a little season, yearly or weekly, to celebrate the resurrection of Christ? But when, a few years later, this was made a wall of separation between Jews and Gentiles; or when, later still, it was made to prove the authority of the Church to appoint feasts and holy-days—the extent of the evil became apparent, and the wickedness of favoring the practice certain.

These three objections to the religious observance of Christmas, we deem sufficient to justify any man in rejecting it. But we believe that the objections apply equally against the observance of the first day of the week, or Lord's Day, and ought to lead us to reject that also; nor can we see how they can be consistently raised in one case and overlooked in the other.

TRUTH MORE TERRIBLE THAN FICTION.—Under this head, the London Examiner gives some heart-rending accounts of suffering and suicide occasioned by a want of work or starving wages. In one case, a well-behaved and highly-educated woman, after a protracted and hopeless struggle with degradation and famine, destroyed herself by taking oxalic acid. In a letter which she left for a friend, she expressed a hope that her watch and clothes would suffice to lay her in the grave in a humble way, and pay her rent which was due. But for this remarkable letter, written a few hours before her death, her distress and suffering would never have been known, for even in her misery she had put on the best appearance. Such a confession, in the presence of death, tells a sad tale. It is an awful comment on the existing state of society. Yet the coroner stated at the examination, that he had within a few days investigated seven cases of similar destitution, two of which were in the parish where this occurred. Just such tragedies are occurring from time to time in every large city. Do they not call for investigation and a remedy?

SABBATH ACCIDENTS.—Some months ago we were induced, by the unjustifiable use which our cotemporaries were making of accidents upon Sunday, to publish now and then a list of Sabbath accidents. But it has not before fallen to our lot to record so awful a catastrophe as the following:

DREADFUL STEAMBOAT ACCIDENT.—THIRTY-ONE LIVES LOST.—On Saturday, Dec. 14th, the "Belle of Clarksville," came in collision with the "Louisiana," (the former bound from New-Orleans to Nashville, the latter from Memphis for New-Orleans, heavily laden with cotton) by which accident the Belle of Clarksville was entirely demolished. Her hull parted from her cabin and sank insantly, the cabin floating off with the persons saved. The Louisiana was immediately brought round and every exertion was made to save those afloat on small pieces of the wreck. The wreck of the cabin was landed about half a mile below the place where the collision occurred; which was at the foot of the Horse Shoe Bend, twenty-five miles below Helena, Arkansas.

Thirty-one passengers were lost, nearly all of whom were residents of West Tennessee.

The survivors lost all their baggage. There were six valuable race-horses on board, all of which were lost, among them the celebrated mare Ann Haynes. The iron closet containing $12,000 was saved. The cargo of the Belle, lost was insured for $23,000, and the boat for $8,000.

EPISCOPALIANS AND ROMAN CATHOLICS.—The Churchman, speaking of the fact that there were few Episcopalians and no Roman Catholics among the delegates to the Baltimore Convention, uses the following language:

> "This fact, though a small matter, seems to show the growth of sound principles among us. Time was when such a Convention would have had more than 'a few Episcopalians' among its members; and time will be, we hope, when all our people will be as consistent in regard to such amalgamation as 'Roman Catholices.'"

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.—We hope it will be borne in mind, that this Association holds its Semi Annual Meeting with the 3d Church in Brookfield, N. Y., on the third and fourth days of the week before the second Sabbath in January, at the opening of which a Missionary Discourse will be preached by VARNUM HULL, according to the appointment of the Association.

CHEERING.—We are pleased to learn, by a letter from Eld. Alexander Campbell, that unusual religious interest is apparent in Westerly, R. I. Many saints have been quickened, several persons have been hopefully converted from the error of their ways, and others are anxiously inquiring what they shall do to be saved.

ENCOURAGING.—A minister of the Gospel in Western Virginia writes to the Christian Observer as follows:—"During the six months I have spent in South Western Virginia, I have attended eleven sacramental meetings in eight different churches in the counties of Washington and Smythe, and, as near as I can recollect, about one hundred persons have been added to these churches in this time of political excitement."

"THE PRIMITIVE CHRISTIAN," a semi-monthly paper which has been published for a year past by Eld. Jabez Chadwick, has been suspended for want of support. If again commenced, it will be conducted by other hands.

"THE HEAVENLY GOVERNMENT NEWS," is the title of a small sheet issued by Benjamin Clark, of Alden, Erie County, N. Y. "The paper is published by freewill contributions, and as often and many as the funds will warrant."

Anti-Rent Difficulties.—Since the death of two men, through the instrumentality of the anti-rent movements, the subject has assumed a much more serious aspect. Four persons have been arrested and confined in the jail at Hudson. Fears were entertained, that an attempt would be made to rescue the prisoners; and to render the attempt abortive, a force of one hundred men was enrolled, armed, and on duty, while five hundred citizens of Hudson were in readiness at a moment's warning. An independent company of soldiers had likewise been sent from Albany, with 300 stand of arms, to assist in guarding the jail. On Saturday and Sunday, 21st and 22d ult., anti-rent meetings were numerously attended at Claverack. It is not probable that any active measures to put down the agitation will be adopted until the new Governor takes the Chair; meanwhile attention will be turned towards him, and the deepest interest felt in his movements.

• Since writing the above, we learn that on Friday last an express reached Albany from Hudson, informing the Governor that the Sheriff of Columbia County, in his efforts to arrest the supposed murderers of Reifenberg, had been resisted by an assemblage of Indians. After a Cabinet consultation, Governor Bouck directed the Adjutant General to make a requisition of two companies in Albany, and a company of cavalry in New York. Several other arrests have been made, and Boughton (Big Thunder) has been fully committed on a charge of manslaughter in the first degree.

New York Legislature.—The new Legislature is to organize on Tuesday next, when the Governor's Message which is looked for with much interest, will be delivered. The Governor and Lieutenaut Governor elect are now at Albany.

Ex-Gov. Seward met with a serious accident on Thursday last, while on his way by stage from Poughkeepsie to Albany. He was riding outside with the driver, when the back axletree broke, upset the stage, and threw him some fifteen feet upon the frozen ground. His shoulder was dislocated, and his body and limbs much bruised, though it was believed no bones were broken.

Peace Convention.—A Peace Convention was recently held in Worcester, Mass., at which Dr. Bates, formerly President of Middlebury College, presided, and the "Learned Blacksmith" acted as one of the Secretaries. Interesting speeches were made upon the resolution that "all war is inconsistent with the spirit of the Gospel." Similar conventions are to be held in other towns in that vicinity.

Christmas in State Prison.—A committee of the Prison Association recently formed in New York, visited the inmates of the Prison at Sing Sing on Christmas day, explained to them the objects of the Association, and endeavored to encourage them in well-doing. Several addresses were made, which are said to have been exceedingly eloquent, and to have produced a deep impression upon the prisoners.

Pilgrim Festival and Temperance.—In Cincinnati, O., the anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims was to have been extensively celebrated. But a split occurred between the wine-drinking and tee-total parties, which was only reconciled by an agreement that any person might bring wine at his own expense, and that the anti-wine party might walk in the procession and attend the speech without attending the entertainment.

Missionaries Arrived Out.—Rev. Mr. Scudder, and the missionaries who sailed with him last spring, reached Madras on the 4th of Sept., after a four months voyage. The missionaries who sailed for the Sandwich Islands in December, 1843, reached their place of destination in July last.

VICTIMS OF SLAVERY.

It will be seen by the following, that the individuals charged with assisting runaway slaves, in whose trials much interest has been felt, are to endure the utmost penalty of the law.

Rev. Charles T. Torrey.—The Baltimore Patriot states that on Saturday last the Court pronounced its final judgment in the case of Torrey. The motion in arrest of judgment was denied, and it was held that the three indictments under which he had been convicted were all valid. His counsel asked permission of the Court, in obedience to his (Torrey's) request, that he might not be publicly sentenced, which was granted, and the sentence was privately communicated to him as follows: On the 1st indictment, confinement in the Penitentiary from December 28, 1844, to April 2, 1847; on the 2d indictment, until April 2, 1849; on the 3d indictment, until April 2, 1851. Monday last was the day assigned for his removal to the Penitentiary.

Miss Delia A. Webster.—The Louisville Courier of the 24th Dec. says:—"We learn from Lexington, that the Jury in the case of Commonwealth vs. Delia A. Webster, returned a verdict of guilty, and two years' imprisonment in the Penitentiary. The trial of Fairbank was commenced yesterday. No doubt was entertained of his conviction."

The Lexington Observer says of Miss Webster, "We understand that the members of the Jury, in consideration of her sex, signed a petition to the Governor for her pardon."

The Oneida Institute, at Whitesboro, New York, formerly under the presidency of Beriah Green, has passed into the hands of the Free Will Baptists. They will conduct it as a Literary and Theological Seminary, and will maintain the same principles in relation to caste which have been so powerfully and practically vindicated by President Green.

Such is the care with which the English railways are worked, that out of eighteen millions of passengers, in one year, only one person was killed while riding in the train.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

[Compiled for the Recorder.]

Monday, Dec. 23.

House of Representatives.—After some unimportant business had been transacted, Mr. Douglass asked leave to introduce a Joint Resolution for the re-annexation of Texas to the United States, in conformity with the Treaty of 1803 for the purchase of Louisiana. It was objected to.

Mr. A. V. Brown, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the bill to organize a Government in the Territory of Oregon, reported the same with amendments. The bill was then committed to the Committee of the whole House.

Numerous reports from committees, a number of resolutions, notices of motions, bills, &c., were introduced, and the House adjourned over to Thursday on account of Christmas.

Senate.—The bill from the House entitled "An act to provide for the safe keeping and disbursement of the public revenue" (the sub-treasury bill) was received, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Various petitions were received and referred.

Mr. Berrien, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, with amendment, the bill from the House of Representatives establishing a uniform time for holding the election for Electors of President and Vice President.

Several private and unimportant bills were reported, and several resolutions passed.

The resolution offered on Thursday, in relation to refunded moneys, was adopted.

Also, the resolution relating to the iron war steamers.

Also, the resolution calling on the Department of State for further information in regard to the introduction of foreign emigrants.

Several private bills were passed, after which the Senate went into Executive Session for a few moments, and then adjourned till Thursday.

Thursday, Dec. 26.

House.—Mr. Hammett of Miss., with the unanimous consent of the House, presented a petition from a negro of Mississippi, now free, claiming a pension for services rendered while he was a slave during the Revolutionary war. It was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

After some discussion about granting leave of absence to the Clerk, and the presentation of several unimportant memorials and resolutions, the House adjourned.

Senate.—After the presentation of several memorials, the bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise with the sureties of Samuel Swartwout was read a third time and passed. No further business of importance was transacted; and at about a quarter past 1 o'clock the Senate adjourned over till Monday next.

Friday, Dec. 27.

House.—Inquiry was made as to the time when the Texas question should be called up, and Monday next was fixed upon.

In Committee of the Whole, the House went into a lengthy discussion of the bill to graduate and reduce the prices of the public lands, which was cut off by a motion to rise and report. After disposing of several bills from the Senate, the House adjourned till Monday at 12 o'clock.

Case of Thomas W. Dorr.—In the Supreme Court, on Friday, the 27th, Mr. Justice Mc Lean delivered the opinion of the Court, overruling the motion of Mr. Treadwell for a writ of habeas corpus in the case of Thomas W. Dorr. This decision puts the matter to rest.

Florida.—This Territory has applied to Congress for admission into the Union as a State. Her population in 1830 was 48,223, of whom 21,132 were slaves. Her present population is about 60,000. The subject of slavery will undoubtedly be agitated in connection with her admission; and we therefore subjoin the following extract from the State Constitution recently formed and adopted, as we find it in the New York Tribune:

Art. XVI.—General Provisions.

1. The General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves.

2. They shall have no power to prevent emigrants to the State from bringing with them such persons as may be deemed slaves by the laws of any one of the United States; provided they shall have power to enact laws to prevent the introduction of any slaves who may have committed crimes in other States.

3. The General Assembly shall have power to pass laws to prevent free negroes, mulattoes, and other persons of color, from immigrating to this State, or from being discharged from on board any vessel in any of the ports of Florida.

Postage.—The majority of the post-office committee of the House is so decidedly averse to any change in the rates of postage, (having been, doubtless, so arranged by the speaker with reference to this very matter,) that it is not likely there will be any decisive step in reform this session. Although it is believed that the majority of the House feel the impulse of the popular sensibility, and would gladly favor a great reduction, it lies in the power of the committee, during the short session, to prevent the House from reaching the question. We must wait, therefore, for cheap postage, until we can buy the privilege of our masters, the overseers. Still it is best to agitate and keep moving, and send in the petitions—it will come the sooner. [Emancipator.

Tragical Scene.—Yesterday afternoon, the crew of the ship Farwell, on her voyage to Boston, in tow of the City Ice-Boat, refused to do their duty at the time the ship was to be cut off from the steamer, nearly opposite Marcus Hook. They were ordered aft by the first mate, Mr. Engles, at the request of Captain Farwell. While the Captain was taking their namest they were highly mutinous in their language. Upon the mate's interfering to preserve discipline, one of the seamen, named Thomas Forbes, a Scotchman, drew a sheath knife on him, and stabbed him in the left side near the heart. The mate staggered aft, declaring that he was murdered, and soon after expired. Forbes then approached Capt. Farwell, declaring himself to be the murderer, at the same time drawing his knife from his pocket in a menacing manner. The Captain leveled a pistol at him and shot him, but he was not dead at the last accounts. The cause of this tragical event, like that of the majority of such occurrences, was rum. [Phila. Curious Estimates and Curious Taxes.—The State of Kentucky has a curious way of fixing the order of the animal creation as determined by the tax list. Here is the assessor's enumeration for the county of Nelson:

Total white males over 21 years	1,996
Total slaves over 16	2,188
Total children between 5 and 16	1,640
Total Studs, Jacks and Bulls, (rates $60)	22

The order of the animal creation in this philosophical arrangement is: 1st, white males. 2d, human slaves. 3d, children. 4th, studs, jacks and bulls! It seems the women have no place in this philosophy!

But the mode of taxation is equally curious. In Kentucky the tax on land is very light, but look at the people who wear spectacles: Here is the list for Nelson county:

Tax on 48 carriages and barouches	$48 00
Tax on 18 buggies	9 00
Tax on 19 pianos	19 00
Tax on 25 gold spectacles	25 00
Tax on 97 gold watches	97 00
Tax on 46 silver watches	23 00

Unhappy the man who has short sight in Kentucky!—25 spectacles are taxed more than a large estate in land! 25 gold spectacles are taxed more than 19 pianos! The former are worth $300. The latter $5000! But the good people of the county of Owsley may rejoice. There the only tax on articles in the list above, is

Tax on one gold watch	$1 00

Declivity of Rivers.—A very slight declivity will suffice to give the running motion to water. Three inches per mile, in a smooth, and straight channel, gives a velocity of about three miles an hour. The Ganges, which gathers the waters of the Himalaya mountains, the loftiest in the world, is at eighteen hundred miles from its mouth, only eight hundred feet above the level of the sea; that is about twice as high as St. Paul's Church in London, and to fall these eight hundred feet in its long course the water requires more than a month. The great river Magdalena, in South America, running for a thousand miles between two ridges of the Andes, falls only five hundred feet in all that distance. Above the commencement of the thousand miles it is seen descending in rapids and cataracts from the mountains. The gigantic Rio de la Plata has so gentle a descent to the ocean, that in Paraguay, fifteen hundred miles from its mouth, ships are seen which have sailed against the current all the way by the force of the wind alone; that is to say, which on the beautiful inclined plane of the stream, have been gradually lifted by the soft wind, and even against the current, to an elevation greater than that of our loftiest spire. [Pottsville Gaz.

Return of a Runaway Slave.—Capt. Ricketson, of the schooner Cornelia, which sailed hence on Thursday for New Bedford, returned again the same night, having discovered a negro man concealed in the forecastle of the schooner. He, together with the steward of the schr., was promptly turned over to the authorities of Portsmouth. The negro belonged to Mr. Rudder, of Portsmouth. The steward is confined in jail, to undergo an examination for aiding and abetting the escape of said slave. [Norfolk Beacon, 14th.

South Carolina Wine.—The editor of the Savannah Republican has samples of eight kinds of wine, made by Dr. Sidney Smith, of Robertville, Beaufort District, S. C. They are the pure juice of the grape, without the addition of any spirits whatever. One of the specimens is from the vintage of 1833, another from that of '38, and the other six from that of the present year. They differ in flavor according to the species of grape from which they were expressed, the names of which they generally bear; as the Warren Madeira, La Clarence, Catawba, Scuppanong, Virginia Seedling, &c. &c. Dr. S. has on hand some 800 gallons of these wines, which he finds useful for all medical and culinary purposes, such as the light French wines are used for.

Temperance in Ohio.—A convention was held at Columbus on the 18th ult., composed of 289 delegates, representing 52 counties, at which a State Temperence Society was organized, and Gov. Bartley elected President. Measures were adopted for the establishment of a temperance paper at Cincinnati, and for the employment of a State Agent, to devote his whole time to the cause. The Convention sent a memorial to the Legislature praying that the license laws may be so amended as to put it in the power of the legal voters in each ward and township, to determine, at the annual spring elections, that license to sell intoxicating liquors shall not be granted to such ward or township.

Texas.—The annual Message of President Houston was sent into Congress on the 5th ult. In respect to the United States he says:

"Our relations with the United States remain in the same condition as at the time of my last annual communication. We are still without any treaty stipulations between the two countries. Within the two last years, all attempts at their establishment have been negatived by the ratifying power of that government. That any effort for the same purpose will meet with better success, for some time to come, I am unable to determine."

The Message says that, in all but the name, Texas is at peace with Mexico. An additional appropriation of $4,000 for the Indian Department is asked. The finances of the country are prosperous. Defalcations in collecting direct taxes have, however, occurred to the amount of over $52,000. The expenditures from Dec. 1841 up to Nov. last, excluding $50,873 of debt which has been paid, reach the sum of $460,209; the receipts since February, 1842, $466,158. The amount appropriated for the Post Office was $252,970.

Danger of Capital Punishment.—Our friends who advocate the abolition of capital punishment, will find a new circumstance to strengthen their argument in the fact that a man named Rogers was condemned to York Castle on a charge nearly touching his life, and six months afterwards a gang was arrested, one of whom confessed that he had committed the fault for which Rogers was condemned, and that four men had been sent to Botany Bay for crimes which he and his colleagues had perpetrated. [U. S. Gazette.

The Canadian Prisoners.—The Montreal Herald mentions the arrival in that city of one of the persons who for several years has been a prisoner in New South Wales. We presume the whole have been pardoned, and are on their way home. The packet-ship Switzerland, which left London for New York on the 29th of November, has on board thirty of those individuals, who arrived in London from Sidney, a few days before the Switzerland left. [Com. Adv.

From La Guayra.—We have intelligence from La Guayra to November 15th. A. H. Hall, Charge d'Affaires from the United States, was to leave in the next ship, his place to be filled by the new Minister, Mr. Ellis. A rather serious insurrection had broken out in the neighborhood of La Guayra, some 6 or 7 miles from Caraccas; a flag of truce was sent to the hostile army, with offers of pardon and protection to all who would return peaceably to their homes These offers were, however, rejected, and a battle ensued, which resulted in the complete overthrow of the revolters and the death of their leader, Centano Alvarado. The insurgents numbered about 400 men.

Judicial Decision.—Some time ago a slave escaped from Kentucky to Ohio. He was pursued and overtaken. Some of the Ohio abolitionists proposed to buy him. His master acceded to their proposition, and took their bond for $800. Subsequently they refused payment, alledging that, in the contemplation of the laws of Ohio, they had received no consideration. The case came recently before the Supreme Court of Chillicothe, and the Court decided that the Kentuckian was entitled to his money.

Stability of the Scotch Banking System.—At the last investigation before a committee of the House of Commons in 1841, it was stated, that whereas in Scotland the whole loss sustained by the public from bank failures, for a century and a half, amounted to £32,000; the loss to the public, during the previous year in London alone, was estimated at TEN TIMES THAT AMOUNT. [Blackwood.

Remarkable Tree.—In passing through the small village of Prilly, near Lusanne, I was shown a tree of extraordinary size, which had been an object of particular notice for more than three hundred years. It is used like a wall for posting up all sorts of placards, and it was devoted to this use even before the Reformation. When Luther had commenced his contest with the Pope, a decree was fixed on this tree, condemnatory of his famous thesis; and some years later, the Bernese lords posted up, on this same tree, an edict for the reformation of the canton of Vaud, which, you will recollect, was then subject to Berne.

Cincinnati.—This beautiful city has grown very rapidly during the past year. The population is now 70,634. In 1860, if it increases in population at its rate heretofore, it will contain 290,000 inhabitants. The number of houses erected during the past year greatly exceeds the number built in any former year, and the style of building is marked by great improvement. The new houses on Fourth street alone cost $100,000. In addition to the private dwellings and stores, and the rebuilding of several factories which have been burnt during the year, two large manufactories are now ready for occupation. [Tribune.

Cranberries.—Mr. William Hall, of Norway, Maine, has succeeded in raising cranberries on a patch of boggy land. He sowed the berries in the spring, on the snow and ice. The seed took well, and entirely rooted out the weeds. Last year he gathered six bushels from a patch of land about three rods square, which, a few years since, was entirely useless. If this berry, which commands so high a price, can be as easily cultivated as this, it certainly is an object for farmers to try the experiment on their boggy land.

By the last advices from England it appears, that although the Great Britain steamer had been got out of the inner dock, there was another serious obstacle to be overcome before that vessel could cross the Atlantic. At a special meeting of the Company, it was stated to be necessary that £50,000 should be raised by a new subscription to discharge all liabilities. The net yearly earnings of the Great Western were estimated at £8248, and of the Great Britain at £22,465, which would not only give a fair return to the proprietors, but provide a resource ample for every contingency.

The number of steamboats built at Pittsburgh from Dec. 1st, 1843, to Dec. 1844, is fifty, the actual burthen tonnage of which is 12,067 tons. Many of them are of beautiful model, superb finish, and extraordinary speed.

NOTICE.

The Seventh-day Baptist Central Association will hold its semi-annual meeting, with the 3d Church in Brookfield, commencing on the fourth day before the second Sabbath in January next. A full representation from all the churches of the Association is anxiously desired.

G. M. Langworthy, Rec. Sec.

The brethren are probably aware, that the object of this meeting is purely missionary. By the arrangements of the last Association, missionaries were appointed to labor in different places, to which some of them have addressed themselves with considerable success. No arrangements are made for recompensing such laborers, except what the churches voluntarily contribute to this object. Brethren, we wish you to come to this meeting for two objects:—1st. To hear the report of your missionaries, that your hearts may be enlisted more deeply in the glorious cause of missions. 2d. That you may contribute of the substance which God has given you, to forward the cause, by sustaining those who devote themselves to the labor of preaching the Gospel, and such portions of it as are peculiar to our own denomination, to those who are in darkness or in error on these important truths.

DAY OF FASTING AND PRAYER.

It will be remembered, that at the last meeting of the General Conference, a day of fasting and prayer was recommended, to be held on the first day of the week after the first Sabbath in January, being the 5th day of the month. It is hoped that the churches will make timely arrangements for a general and profitable observance of the day. The following are the resolutions of the Conference:—

Resolved, That inasmuch as the first day of November, 1843, was observed, in accordance with the recommendation of this General Conference, as a day of humiliation before God, and earnest entreaty to Him to arise and plead for his holy Sabbath, since which time a deeper and wider-spread interest upon the subject has sprung up, than has ever been before known in this country; therefore, Resolved, That the 1st first day of the week in January next, be observed as a day of fasting, devout acknowledgment for blessings bestowed, and earnest prayer that God would continue to plead for his holy Sabbath, and also prepare us by his Holy Spirit for the labor thus devolved upon us.

Resolved, That we invite all who love the Sabbath, and desire its better observance, to unite with us in presenting its interests at the throne of grace.

THE BRIDGE OF SIGHS.

One more Unfortunate,
Weary of breath,
Rashly importunate,
Gone to her death!

Take her up tenderly,
Lift her with care,
Fashioned so slenderly,
Young, and so fair!

Look at her garments
Clinging like cerements;
Whilst the wave constantly
Drips from her clothing;
Take her up instantly,
Loving, not loathing.

Touch her not scornfully;
Think of her mournfully,
Gently and humanly;
Not of the stains of her;
All that remains of her
Now is pure womanly.

Make no deep scrutiny
Into her mutiny,
Rash and undutiful;
Past all dishonor,
Death has left on her
Only the beautiful.

Still, for all slips of hers,
One of Eve's family—
Wipe those poor lips of hers,
Oozing so clammily.

Loop up her tresses,
Escaped from the comb,
Her fair auburn tresses;
Whilst wonderment guesses
Where was her home?

Who was her father?
Who was her mother?
Had she a sister?
Had she a brother?
Or was there a dearer one
Still, and a nearer one
Yet, than all other?

Alas! for the rarity
Of Christian charity
Under the sun!
Oh, it was pitiful!
Near a whole city full,
Home she had none.

Sisterly, brotherly,
Fatherly, motherly
Feelings had changed;
Love, by harsh evidence,
Thrown from its eminence;
Even God's providence
Seeming estranged.

Where the lamps quiver
So far in the river,
With many a light
From window and casement,
From garret to basement,
She stood, with amazement,
Houseless by night.

The bleak wind of March
Made her tremble and shiver;
But not the dark arch,
Or the black flowing river;

Mad from life's history,
Glad to death's mystery,
Swift to be hurl'd
Any where, any where
Out of the world!

In she plunged boldly,
No matter how coldly
The rough river ran—
Over the brink of it,
Picture it—think of it,
Dissolute man!
Lave in it, drink of it,
Then, if you can!

Take her up tenderly,
Lift her with care;
Fashioned so slenderly,
Young, and so fair.

Ere her limbs frigidly
Stiffen too rigidly,
Decently—kindly,
Smooth and compose them;
And her eyes, close them,
Staring so blindly!

Dreadfully staring
Through muddy impurity,
As when with the daring,
Last look of despairing,
Fix'd on futurity.

Perishing gloomily,
Spurr'd by contumely,
Cold inhumanity,
Burning insanity,
Into her rest.
Cross her hands humbly,
As if praying dumbly,
Over her breast!

Owning her weakness,
Her evil behaviour,
And leaving, with meekness,
Her sins to her Saviour!

PRISON ASSOCIATION.

We noticed the organization of this Association some weeks ago, and we are sure our readers will be interested in a full report of the meeting at which it took place. We therefore publish the following:—

The call for the meeting published in the public prints of the city was subscribed by above sixty of the most respectable and distinguished men in community. The audience convened was large and highly intelligent—and the objects presented met a hearty response from all present. Vice Chancellor Mc Coun presided, Rev. Dr. Spring and Gen. P. M. Wetmore were chosen Vice Presidents, J. L. O'Sullivan and John Jay Esqs. Secretaries. J. W. Edmonds Esq. President of the board of Inspectors of the Sing Sing Prison, submitted a resolution proposing the formation of a society, and sustained it by an able address of some length, presenting his views of the past and present systems of discipline adopted in that and similar Institutions; also various interesting statistics. He was followed by Hugh Maxwell Esq. and several others, who made suggestions of deep interest both in relation to the various causes of crime, the necessity of adopting preventive measures and other matters relevant to the meeting. Remarks were made concerning the condition of the pauper youth of our city, of both sexes, the volunteers connected with Engine Companies, and the discharged convicts who are homeless, shelterless and characterless,—in a certain sense,—and often almost driven to depredate upon society to support existence.

A Committee having been appointed to draft a Constitution, presented the following, which was adopted.

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I. This Society shall be known as the Prison Association of New York.

ART. II. Its objects shall be—

1. The amelioration of the condition of prisoners whether detained for trial or finally convicted, or as witnesses.

2. The improvement of Prison Discipline, and the government of prisons, whether for cities, counties or States.

3. The support and encouragement of reformed convicts after their discharge, by affording them the means of obtaining an honest livelihood and sustaining them in their efforts at reform.

ART. III. The officers of the Society shall be a President, four Vice Presidents, a Recording Secretary, a Corresponding Secretary, a Treasurer, and the following Committees, viz: A Finance Committee, a Committee on Detentions, a Committee on Discipline, and a Committee on Discharged Convicts.

ART. IV. The officers named in the preceding article, shall constitute an Executive Committee, who shall choose one of their number to be Chairman thereof, and any five of their number shall constitute a quorum.

ART V. The Executive Committee shall meet once in each month and keep regular minutes of their proceedings. They shall have a general superintendence and direction of the affairs of the Society, and shall annually report to the Society all their proceedings, and such other matters as shall be likely to advance the ends of the association.

ART. VI. The Society shall meet annually in the city of New York, at such time and place as the Executive Committee shall appoint, and at such other times as the President, or on his absence one of the Vice Presidents, shall designate.

ART. VII. Any person contributing $2 per year shall, during such contribution, be a member of the Society. A contribution of $25 shall constitute a member for life.

The concluding statement is from the report that appeared in the New York Tribune.

The following resolution was sustained by Prof. Telkampf:

Resolved, That the state and condition of Prison Discipline, including the treatment which prisoners receive during their confinement, the amelioration of the condition of Prisoners, the improvement of the government of our Prisons, and the substitution in their management of the Law of Kindness for that of Force, are objects worthy the attention of Philanthropists, and deserve the particular consideration of such a Society.

* * * *

The resolution was adopted with great unanimity.

The next resolution proposed was the following:

Resolved, That to sustain and encourage discharged Convicts who give satisfactory evidence of repentance and reformation in their endeavors to lead honest lives, by affording them employment and guarding them against temptation, is demanded of us not only by the interests of Society but by every dictate of Humanity.

The following resolution was then presented:

Resolved, That in the formation of such a Society it would be proper to have a Female Department, to be especially regardful of the interests and welfare of prisoners of that sex.

Before the question was put on this resolution, Mr. Edmons read to the meeting the following interesting communication from several benevolent Ladies who have been laboring with no small degree of success to ameliorate the condition of their own sex who are imprisoned for crime under the authority of our City Courts.

"Observing the call to the Public, inviting both 'ladies and gentlemen' to convene this evening, for the purpose of organizing a Prison Association, to promote the well-being of the prisoner, a few ladies, whose hearts respond with gratitude to such a call, and whose sympathies have for years been deeply moved by scenes witnessed in their stated visits in the Female Department of the City Prison, present, by request, a few facts that may have a bearing on the subject before the meeting.

Long since when the male and female prisoners were placed beneath the same roof, in different tiers of cells, under keepers who were "men of all principles, and of no principle," abuses were witnessed that made their hearts bleed—and constrained them to appeal, in their humble capacity, to our rulers for redress. They prayed 'for humanity's sake,' that separate apartments, and a Matron might be provided for their sex—Their prayer was granted, in part, by the desired division of the prisoners—but years have since elapsed, during which no Matron was appointed, and the moral and physical condition of this department was deplorable. During the past season the Common Council have nobly responded to a "petition and memorial" presented them on this subject. Through the untiring efficiency of two gentlemen of their Committee on Prisons, viz. Messrs. Gale & Ward, every practicable improvement has been made, and two Matrons have been appointed who have thus far filled the station assigned them, with credit and usefulness. These Matrons report that since assuming their office, on the 12th of August last, the names of over sixteen hundred women have been registered, who have been committed there for trial. Of this number many have been given up to their parents in this city; six have been discharged and sent to their homes in different States, five of whom were under 23 years of age, the other was an invalid, and being past recovery, expressed a wish to die with her mother, who resides in Conn. Means were accordingly furnished, and she was sent home. Six have been provided with good places in this city, and are doing well. Two have been sent to the Magdalen Asylum, and two have given evidence of saving conversion to God.

Cases have occurred where the poor and friendless have been committed on suspicion, and on a careful investigation of the case have been found to be innocent, and the kindness and consideration shown them has won their lasting gratitude. In one instance of this kind the wronged one was taken from the prison into a Christian family as a domestic, and their testimony is that they never had a better servant.

A religious meeting is held with the prisoners on Friday of each week, also on the Sunday, and with encouraging results. On last Friday, after a season of prayer, reading and personal conversation, as the group were about to retire to their cells, it was affecting to see them, one after another, turn back, and with tearful eyes, thank the ladies for what had been said to them. Cases of thrilling interest might be cited, showing that this class of persons have claims upon Christian sympathy that have scarce begun to be realized, and that with proper effort many of them might be savingly reformed. Those who have gauged but in part the mental, physical and moral wants of this unfortunate class, have felt most deeply that Society does them great injustice. The following case will illustrate our meaning. A prisoner, whose term had just expired, was urged before going out to sign the temperance pledge and lead a new life. She responded, with a voice half choked by emotion—"I would, but how can I? I go from here—I have no friends, no clothing, no money. No person will harbor me, because I have been in prison, No one will give me a character, and I have no place to stop, even for the night, but in the street or some den of vice and shame. I wish to reform—but what can I do? Where can I go that I shall not be lost?" This is not an isolated case, but one of hundreds that we have witnessed.

One thing has been strongly impressed on our minds by the little experience we have had among prisoners, viz: that those in whose charge they are intrusted need not only philanthropy and benevolence, but evangelical piety. The wounds to be healed in their cases lie too deep to be reached by any agency aside from Christian sympathy, so manifested as to lead the sin-stricken soul to "wash its stains away" in the precious fountain opened by Him who 'came to seek and to save the lost.'

We shall rejoice if at this meeting an interest shall be elicited that will lead the Christian community to remember the words of Jesus—"I was sick, and in prison and ye came unto me. Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these ye have done it unto me."

PRISON VISITORS."

This letter was listened to with much interest, after which the resolution was adopted.

A gentleman, whose name we did not learn, made a few observations respecting the efforts which had been made in Boston for the reform of prisoners, after which

Charles Stearns, a discharged convict, came forward and made some statements respecting his own case. He asserted his innocence of the crime for which he had suffered, and spoke with great severity of the legal authorities. When he had concluded, the meeting was adjourned.

A BOLD PREACHER—RESULTS.

When we recollect before whom Bourdaloue preached; that he had, for his auditors, the most luxurious court in Europe, and a monarch abandoned to ambition and pleasure, we shall find it impossible not to honor the preacher, for the dignified simplicity with which he uniformly held up to his audience the severity of the Gospel, and the scandal of the cross. Now and then, and ever with a very bad grace, he makes an unmeaning compliment to the monarch. On these occasions, his genius appears to desert him; but he never disguises the morality of the gospel, or withholds its threats. In one of the sermons which he preached before the monarch, he described, with matchless eloquence, the horror of an adulterous life, its abomination in the eye of God, its scandal to man, and the public and private evils which attended it; but he managed his discourse with so much address, that he kept the king from suspecting that the thunder of the preacher was ultimately to fall upon him. In general Bourdaloue spoke in a level tone of voice, and with his eyes almost shut. On this occasion, having wound up the attention of the monarch and the audience to the highest pitch, he paused. The audience expected something terrible, and seemed to fear the next word. The pause continued for some time; at length the preacher fixing his eyes directly on his royal hearer, and in a tone of voice equally expressive of horror and concern, said, in the words of the prophet, "thou art the man!" then, leaving these words to their effect, he concluded with a mild and general prayer to heaven, for the conversion of all sinners. A miserable courtier observed, in a whisper, to the monarch, that the boldness of the preacher exceeded all bounds, and should be checked. "No, sir," replied the monarch, "the preacher has done his duty, let us do ours." When the service was concluded, the monarch walked slowly from the church, and ordered Bourdaloue into his presence. He remarked to him, his general protection of religion, the kindness which he had ever shown to the Society of Jesus, his particular attention to Bourdaloue and his friends. He then reproached him with the strong language of the sermon: and asked him, what could be his motive for insulting him, thus publicly, before his subjects? Bourdaloue fell on his knees: "God is my witness, that it was not my wish to insult your majesty; but I am a minister of God, and must not disguise his truth.—What I said in my sermon is my morning and evening prayer:—May God in his infinite mercy grant me to see the day, when the greatest of kings shall be the holiest." The monarch was affected, and silently dismissed the preacher: but from this time, the court began to observe that change which afterward, and at no distant period, led Lewis to a life of regularity and virtue.

The following appropriate reflections on the commencement of the New Year, we copy from the Advocate of Moral Reform:—

THE NEW YEAR.

> "Life's little stage is a small eminence,
> Inch high the grave above; that home of man,
> Where dwells the multitude. We gaze around,
> We read their monuments—we sigh; and while
> We sigh, we sink; and are what we deplored;
> Lamenting, or lamented, all our lot."
>
> YOUNG.

"A happy New Year,"—the common salutation with which friend meets friend, on the return of this anniversary, falls alike from the lip of lisping childhood and weary age. Youth and manhood respond to the sentiment, the heart's pulses beat more lightly, ties of kindred and of society seem for the time to have acquired new strength, and the day glides away on rapid wing. Thus will it be with thousands who are accustomed to regard this as a gala day, a season of festivity and recreation. But to those who have learned to "walk thoughtful on the silent shore of that vast ocean" on which we must so soon embark, the occasion will not only inspire good wishes and kind affections, but associations of solemn interest will be awakened, and the mind led 'back to the regions of the far dark past,' and forward to the unknown, but portentous future.

What of the night? What its signs of promise?—what of fear—what of hope—are inquiries of deep interest to those whose faces are Zionward, and who long for the day, when He whose right it is, shall reign King of nations. In the review of the past year, we find events that show conclusively that the prediction is being fulfilled, (Ezek. 21: 27,) "I will overturn, overturn, overturn, until he come," etc. The most important of these events, however, seem but the preparation for a coming crisis—a new epoch in the world's history—a victory of truth over error—of right over wrong—of humanity over oppression, and of the Prince of Peace over the Prince of darkness, and his uncounted legions. True, this desired era may be yet far in the distance, but whether it shall advance noiselessly and gradually, like the gentle swell of the river, or whether it shall come like the rushing torrent, it will be none the less welcome to those who watch and wait for its appearing.

Many who look only at one aspect of things, conceive the present to be "a day of darkness and gloominess, a day of clouds and of thick darkness." (Zeph. 1: 15) The desire of their hearts in many respects is not realized—the rulers they would have chosen have been defeated—systems and projects of iniquity still prosper—on the side of the oppressor is power—the lacerated wounds of the crushed bondsman are still unclosed—the spoiler prowls abroad, and the innocent becomes his prey—Virtue bleeds, and truth and justice are fallen in our streets.—The war of the moral elements has alienated hearts that once "like kindred drops seemed melted into one"—error and wrong bear fearful sway—souls are being sealed for perdition, and death is bearing them away in countless numbers, while multitudes of Christ's professed disciples are sleeping at their posts, and few are found who sigh and cry in secret places because of these manifold desolations.

This is one side of the picture—dark indeed and full of sorrow, but blessed be God, there is a brighter side. Amid all this "our Father is at the helm"—so arranging he providences as to bring order out of this confusion, and light from this darkness. His arm is strong, and his cause is safe. His counsel shall stand, while the wrath of man is made to praise him, and the remainder restrained.

Does the system of legalized oppression, with all its nameless abominations, not only maintain its ground, but threaten aggressive movements by acquiring new territory? Human bondage cannot clank its chain beyond a certain limit. As the instrument of death on board the Princeton, wrought ruin little dreamed of—so in an unexpected hour, and by unexpected means, may the Avenger of blood, blast the projects of those who devise evil, and bring deliverance to the captive. On this subject, so much light has not been shed and prayer offered in vain. The heart of the nation has not been reached, and stirred to its inmost depths, to sink back to its former apathy. Ground is gained, not again to be lost, and the car of Freedom is onward. Not only does the spirit of the age demand it should be so, but the predictions, commands and promises of the word of God accord with it. The spirit of the age, in one of its peculiar developments, seems truly heaven-inspired. Humanity personified, seems moving about, like some invisible agent, inquiring at the door of human hearts for some chord that will respond to its touch. Its plea for the victim of intemperance has been heard—the inmates of the prison and the children of crime and degradation, do not now, as formerly, ask in vain for human sympathy. A leaven has been working that has arrested public attention, and many who have been heretofore ready to inquire, "Am I my brother's keeper?" are now asking in sincerity of soul, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" The collision of mind with mind is constantly eliciting and elucidating great truths, separating the precious from the vile, and aiding in the predicted overturn that must necessarily precede the final triumph of truth and righteousness.

THE REFORMER.

BY R. H. BACON.

The true Reformer, like the pioneer,
Who hews the western forest, must throw by
All thought of ease or resting till he die:
Nor in his noble breast admit the fear
Of ill; although, through life, he may not hear
The voice of friend, nor see one loving eye
To cheer him on his way of duty high,
And warn him when his foes are lurking near!
Yet fields of beauty, by his dauntless hand,
Shall rise in loveliness, where now the gloom
Of error doth the light of truth withstand:
The lonely wilderness he fells shall bloom
Throughout all aftertime; and those who now
Scowl with mad hate, before his tomb shall bow.

A FORTUNE SPENT UPON A BOOK.

The Democaatic Review says, that the most costly undertaking ever attemped by a single individual, of a literary character, which unquestionably the world has yet seen, is the magnificent work on the Aborigines of Mexico, by the late Lord Kingsborough. This stupendous work is said to have been produced at the enormous cost to the author of £30,000 or $150,000. It is composed of seven immense folio volumes, embellished by about one thousand superb illustrations, colored so exquisitely as to represent the originals with the most faithful exactness. These volumes are of such extraordinary dimensions as to be almost importable. This unprecedented instance of munificence in the patronage of literature, is rendered the more astonishing from the lamentable fact of its having proved the ultimate ruin of the projector. Not only did this enthusiastic nobleman undertake to defray the entire expense attending the publication, in every item of which, as might have been expected, he had to meet the most exorbitant charges, but he actually determined to have a very limited number of copies printed, we believe only fifty, after which the lithographic drawings, from which the plates were taken, were erased. These copies were printed for gratuitous presentation to the several Royal and Public Libraries in Europe. It is painful to add, that this noble patron actually died in debt, a few years since, a sad instance of self-immolation to his munificence, in a prison in Dublin. A copy of this gorgeous work is in the Philadelphia Library.

The face of a young person is like the face of a clock: if you look upon it you may guess what is inwardly going on, for no boy or girl can be pleased without showing it.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

President of the Board of Trustees

LEAVES FROM A TRAVELER'S NOTE-BOOK—NO. 11.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

Among the numerous institutions in London endowed for the gratuitous education of the young, none takes a higher stand than Christ's Hospital, or the Blue Coat School. It was founded for the "innocent and fatherless," by Edward the Sixth, and at first consisted of a grammar-school for boys and girls. Charles the Second endowed it with $5000 to be paid annually for seven years, to found a school for the instruction of forty boys in mathematics and navigation. Additional endowments have been made, until the revenues of the Hospital, from royal and private donations in houses and lands, and from various privileges conferred upon it by the city, are very great—sufficient to warrant an annual expenditure of $150,000. There are upon the foundation twelve or fifteen hundred children, who are receiving the benefit of a good education. The course of instruction is principally designed to fit the pupils for trades and merchants' counting rooms; but one is annually sent to Cambridge, to be educated for the church.

The boys are frequently to be seen in the street, and are easily distinguished by their dress. It consists of a long blue cloth tunic, made to fit the body down to the waist, and then descending loosely to the ancles, with an open front; a yellow undercoat; yellow worsted stockings; drab knee breeches; a leather belt around the waist; and a small worsted cap, which is much more frequently carried in the hand than worn upon the head. They make a fanciful appearance running about in such habiliments; yet the dress is regarded as a badge of honor, and being that of the age in which the institution was founded, it must continue to be worn while the institution stands.

The Hospital occupies the site of the ancient friary of Franciscans, which was built in 1225, the old cloisters of which still remain. The building is very irregular, yet the south front, adjoining Newgate street, is highly ornamented, has Doric pilasters, and a statue of Edward the founder of the institution. An extensive Hall was opened in 1829, which is one of the noblest buildings in the Metropolis, and may be considered as the principal entrance to the establishment. In this Hall a ceremony takes place on Sunday, to which strangers are admitted, and which will interest the spectator. At the close of the morning service in an adjoining church, the boys proceed to the Hall to dine. The room is high, its walls are ornamented with valuable paintings, and in one end of it, at an elevation of some thirty feet, is a gallery for the accommodation of visitors. We were in the gallery when the procession began to come in. Two by two they entered, and proceeded to their appropriate places at the tables. Before they were all arranged, a side door opened, and in came a long procession of boys, each with a basket of bread upon his shoulder, which was disposed of in its appropriate part of the hall, in the most orderly manner. About the same time another side door opened, through which a procession of boys brought in baskets of potatoes, which were disposed of in like manner. Meanwhile the whole eight hundred tongues, and twice that number of feet, had been in constant motion, producing, to our ears who sat high above the scene of action, a sound not unlike the voice of many waters. At length, however, every thing was arranged; the monitors and carvers had all taken their places; and the note was given for silence and the "blessing." Simultaneously the whole company kneeled, and the most profound silence prevailed, while one of their number invoked the divine blessing upon them and their food. This done, the silence was broken as suddenly as it commenced, and our ears were again saluted with the sounds from which for a moment they had been relieved. The meal was plain but wholesome, and when it was completed, the children retired in procession, bowing to the company.

London has several institutions similar in design and conduct to this Hospital. But none of them equal it in extent and facilities for a thorough primary education. Indeed, so great are its facilities, that many beside "the innocent and fatherless" are said to seek its advantages. However this may be, it has undoubtedly done much good to the class for whom it was designed.

OLD BAILEY.

Near the institution just described, stands Newgate Prison, (Old Bailey,) the site of which is intimately connected with the history of many good and great men. As far back as the year 1218, it was mentioned as a receptacle for prisoners, and it is now the general prison for the city and county. It has undergone many alterations since the first notices we have of it. In 1777 it was taken down in order to raise a more substantial structure, which still occupies the original site and bears the original name. There are three departments of the prison—one for convicts, another for persons confined for fines and misdemeanors, and a third for females. Four hundred prisoners can easily be accommodated here, but the actual number has sometimes been twice that. A neat chapel is provided, where prayers are read at regular hours, and a sermon is delivered on Sunday. Besides this provision for the prisoners in general, persons under sentence of death have private prayers read with them frequently. The present building was designed by Mr. Dance the younger, and is somewhere declared to be one of the most characteristic designs in Europe. The visitor will think as much, for the mere sight of its dark and sombre exterior is sufficient to conjure up visions of suffering and cruelty. Instead of gazing longer upon this scene of Francis Bampfield's imprisonment and death, or taking a look at the adjacent site of the old Fleet Prison, in which John Trask was confined, let us turn to a pleasanter sight near by.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL

Is an object of admiration second only to St. Peter's at Rome in size and style of architecture. It stands on high ground, near the center of the metropolis, and may therefore be seen from every part of the city. The appearance of its dome, towering above every thing else in the vicinity, first led somebody to name it the "Extinguisher," a name which has since been applied with reference to its religious influence, how justly it is not easy to say. This site was anciently occupied by a Cathedral named St. Paul's, which was so injured by the great fire of 1666 that it was deemed advisable to remove it, and give place to the present magnificent building. It is the greatest achievement of a great architect, who is kept in memory by the following inscription upon a marble slab, occupying a prominent place in the building:

> "Beneath lies Christopher Wren, the architect of this church and city, who lived more than ninety years, not for himself alone, but for the public. Reader, do you seek his monument? Look around!"

This Cathedral, which covers more than two acres of ground, occupied thirty-five years in building; and, strange as it may seem, it was carried on under one architect, the work undertaken and prosecuted by one contractor, and the whole completed while one prelate filled the see of London. It cost the nation about $7,000,000, which was collected by a tax on coals.

There are three entrances to the building, through large porticos of the Corinthian order, surmounted by statues of the Apostles and Evangelists. But the impression inspired by the exterior is greatly increased on entering, by the loftiness of the vaulting, and the long range of columns which are presented to the view. The great central dome is supported by eight piers, forming four arches which open into the side aisles. It is impossible to describe the impression produced by standing under that high dome, viewing its spacious concave, glancing through those long side aisles, and considering the whole as the labor of men, each one of whom is a mere pigmy by the side of his own work. The Cathedral is open for divine service every day; and at such times it is a luxury to repeat and add to that impression, by standing under the dome, and giving one's self up to the power of the music which swells along the arch from an adjoining choir.

Numerous monuments of the brave and talented have of late been placed in this Cathedral.—Here is a statue of the learned Dr. Johnson, and opposite to it is one of John Howard the Philanthropist. Here is also a monumental group to the memory of Nelson, and an equestrian monument of Sir Ralph Abercrombie, who is represented as falling from his horse in consequence of a wound just received, and as being caught and supported by an attendant Highlander. These monuments are all modern, and consequently less spoken of than those in some of the old Cathedrals, their day being yet to come. After viewing them, one should visit the Library, containing a rare collection of ecclesiastical works and manuscripts; the Model Room, containing some ancient designs of architecture; the great Bell, which weighs four tons and a quarter, is ten feet in diameter, and is only tolled on the death of a member of the royal family, the lord-mayor, or the bishop of London; the Clock, whose dial is nine feet across, minute hand eight feet in length, pendulum fourteen feet long, carrying a weight equal to 112 pounds; and the Whispering Gallery, so far famed for its extraordinary reverberation of sound. If one has courage to do so, he may also visit the Ball, which is 616 steps from the ground, weighs 5,600 pounds, is large enough for eight persons to sit in, and affords a favorable view of the whole of London. But as the ascent to the ball is difficult and dangerous, most persons are satisfied without reaching it, and find, as they retire from the place, that they have already seen enough to bewilder them.

Popular Preaching.—Dr. Emmons being asked, What is the secret of popular preaching? replied, to preach without meddling with your hearers' consciences; and, again, preach with animation enough to produce a great excitement of the natural sympathies, which will make persons think they have some native goodness; and still again, let your sermons be without beginning, middle, or end.

THE VIRTUOUS WIFE.

Rabbi Meir, the great teacher, sat on the Sabbath in the place of assembly, and taught the people. Meantime his two sons died; both were lovely to the eyes; both were enlightened in the law. His wife removed them to the balcony, placed them upon her own bed, and spread a white covering over them. At evening, Rabbi Meir came home. "Where are my sons?" said he, "that I may give them a blessing."

Their mother replied, "They are at school, learning the law."

"I looked about," he answered, "but did not see them."

They reached him a cup, he blessed the Lord at the outgoing of the Sabbath, drank, and asked once more, "Where are my sons, that they also may drink of the wine of blessing?"

"Not far distant," said she, seating him to his repast. It was good cheer. When he had returned thanks, she said, "Allow me an inquiry."

"Speak then, my love," said he.

"A few days ago," she continued, "two lovely jewels were given to my keeping, and now they are demanded. Must I give them back?"

"Does my wife ask this?" replied Rabbi Meir. "Wilt thou hesitate to restore to each their own?"

"Oh no, my teacher, but I could not return them till thou had'st seen them." Then she led him upon the balcony, and drew aside the covering, "Alas! my sons," bemoaned the father. "O my sons! You taught me in the law."

They turned away and wept. At length she took him by the hand and said, "Rabbi, hast thou not taught me that one must not refuse to restore what has been entrusted to their charge? See, the Lord hath given, the Lord hath taken away, and blessed be his name."

"And blessed be his name!" responded Rabbi Meir. It is well said, that he who hath found a virtuous wife, hath a greater treasure than costly pearls. "She openeth her mouth in wisdom, and on her lips is the law of kindness."

THE JEWS IN MOROCCO AND ALGIERS.

The following interesting account of the state of the Jews in Morocco and Algiers is given by a gentleman who has recently traveled on the north coast of Africa. We find it in the Jewish Chronicle.

The Israelites who are settled in the towns of Tangier, Tetuan, and El Araiche, originally emigrated from the two Castiles, in Spain, whence they were driven by the persecutions of the most Catholic sovereign of that country. Their features have quite a Spanish cast. Both men and women speak the Spanish language with great purity and fluency, and it would be impossible to distinguish many of them from bona fide Spaniards, had they the European dress. Out of a population of 7,000 in Tangier, there are 2,000 Jews. But the amount of the population of Jews in every part of the immense region of Western Barbary is very great. As far as I was able to ascertain, there are 15,000 Jews in the capital Morocco, 12,000 in Fez, 12,000 in Mequinez, &c., &c.

The population daily increases, chiefly in consequence of a peculiar and despotic law of the Emperor, which does not permit a Jewess to leave the country without the payment of a hundred dollars; six dollars only being paid by a Jew. The reason assigned for the anxiety of the Emperor to prevent Jews from emigrating is, that the Jews are the principal artizans, tradesmen, merchants, &c., and the finances of the country are almost solely dependent upon the pecuniary transactions of the rich Jews, of whom there are not a few. The rich Jews, however, manage their matters well here, for they always keep as much money as possible in the hands of the European bankers, in different parts of the Mediterranean. They have also mercantile transactions with Algiers and the Levant.

The Jews of Tangier (2,000 in number,) pay the Emperor a poll-tax of 1,200 Spanish dollars. This is collected by the chiefs of the Israelites, and is exacted very fairly, according to the means of each family. The Moorish Government employs the Jews in many distinguished posts; for instance, as commissioners of finance, and commissary-generals, but all this service performed by them is honorary.

There are five synaguoges in Tangier, which hold from 200 to 400 persons, four schools for children, and one for adults, or those who study the Talmud.

Education, that is, religious education, I am quite sure, is more diffused among the Jews of Western Barbary than, for instance, among the Jews in Bayonne, where there are few who can read Hebrew; in Morocco, all can read it. On Sunday last, I went to a Jewish school and saw some fifty boys all reading commentaries in Hebrew. The boys were delighted by seeing me read a little Hebrew. They had never before seen a Christian who could read that language. They imagined I must be an English Jew. There are several learned rabbies here. The conversion of Jews to Christianity is unknown in this country, for whenever a Jew is disposed to embrace Christianity, he leaves the country, and goes to France or Spain. Were a Jew to make a confession of Christianity here, he would be immediately imprisoned if poor, and robbed of all his wealth if rich. This is the system of punishment here. For example, if a Jew is caught on the Sabbath smoking or touching fire, he is fined heavily if rich, imprisoned if poor. Sometimes also he is bastinadoed. Jews, however, frequently become Mussulmans. During this year, two Jews and one Jewess in Tangier have become Mussulmans. The process of conversion is very simple. They have merely to make the well-known declaration, "There is but one God, and Mahomet is his prophet," and the conversion is complete, whereas the Christians have, in addition, to undergo the ceremony of circumcision. When a Moor takes a Jewess for a wife, the wife must become a Mahometan. Moors, of course, never become Jews. The state punishment for this crime, if it should ever occur, is burning alive.

The Government also consults the learned Jews in cases of difficulty, more especially of criminal law, which is evidently a great honor conferred on this ancient people, amidst the innumerable insults which they are compelled to bear in this part of the world. I am told also, that Sidi Ashem, the Pasha of Suse, or Soos, in the south-western part of Morocco, is very fond of the Jews, and treats them with very great distinction. The Jews are likewise permitted to judge all disputes between their own people. However, the Jews are suffering many humiliating things. When they pass a mosque, a maraboot, or a dwelling of a saint, and even a Moorish school, in which the Koran is usually read, they are obliged to take off their shoes. They are compelled to wear black turbans or caps, and black shoes. The women, however, are allowed to dress in all colors. A Jew cannot ride on a horse, and in town he cannot ride at all. If a Moor curses or calls a Jew ill names, the Jew must not retort; he may, however, report the case to the cadi, or Moorish Judge, and then the Jew generally obtains justice. The Emperor never employs a Jew as a soldier. European Jews, however, are treated like Christians, they are, in fact, subjects of the different consular representatives of Christian powers in this city. I should also mention that the Moors respect the religion of the Jews, their burying places, &c., like those of the Christians. If a Jewish criminal professes Islamism, he is immediately pardoned by Government, whatever his crimes may be.

With the exception of religious ceremonies, the manners and customs of the Morocco Jews are like those of the Moors. The common superstitions of Barbary are also shared equally by Moors and Jews, and even by the Christians of Barbary. In one thing the state of the Jews of Morocco is different from that of their brethren in many parts of both Europe and Africa; that is, that they are here not restricted to any certain quarter of the city; their houses are mixed with those of the Moors. My experience in this country has convinced me that the fears of certain people, as to the cruelty and ferocity of the Moors of Morocco, are quite exaggerated, and in many respects, altogether false. I am quite certain that in Tangier, and all the cities of the coast, a missionary to the Jews can exercise his sacred and important duties without any difficulty, always provided that he be prudent. Had I had Hebrew Testaments with me, I should have circulated them without any fear of exposing myself.

The number of Jews on the coast is thus stated by the most accredited authorities:—Tetuan, 4,200; some very rich and learned amongst them. Tangier, 2,000; luxury is rather prevalent among them, and they imitate European manners. Aziba, 250; El Araiche, 1,200; El Mehedia, two or three families; Sla ad Rabbat, 7,000, chiefly merchants, and very rich; Das el Baida, 350; Azamor, 1,200; Mazagan, 1,000; Saffi, 3,000, very poor and miserable; Mogadore, 5,000; Santa Cruz, 400. All these towns can be visited without difficulty, being sea-ports. In several there are Christians resident, and English and other consuls. The Jews of Morocco are in many most important matters the real masters of this country, although to all outward appearances, the slaves; and as the genius of the present Emperor, Abd Errahman, is commerce and wealth, the Jews must be his especial favorites.

It is astonishing how regularly the Jews keep heir Sabbath, and often to their great disadvantage. The other day a circumstance took place which illustrates the devotion of the Morocco Jews in a striking manner. The wind had been blowing from the east a long time, so that the Jews could not go to Gibraltar with provisions for that garrison: at length the wind changed—but it was their Sabbath. The next day they went to the minister of the Custom-House to get their bill of health, &c.; the man demanded, "Why did you not come yesterday?" The Jews replied, "It was our Sabbath." "Oh, very well," said the man, "to day is my feast. The Christians have their feasts, and are not we Mussulmen to have our feasts?" The Jewish traffickers, indeed, have been detained for days, during the time of the great Moorish feast, "Elaid Kabir," because they did not avail themselves of the day on which their Sabbath fell.

On the Jewish Sabbath both Mohammedans and Christians are obliged to cease from labor, for the accommodation of the Jews. But the Jews must purchase this privilege of the Sultan for a considerable annual amount. All the European society of Mogadore is Jewish—composed chiefly of London and Gibraltar Jews. The other evening there was a ball, at which all the consuls and Christians were present, but the élite of the company were Jews and Jewesses. The imperial merchants, those merchants who do business here under the immediate auspices of the Government, and whom the Emperor gives credit, are, with the exception of three Protestant Englishmen, all Jews. As to the enjoyments of the Jews in this country, you can form no conception. During the month I have been here, Jewish society, both native and European, has been a succession of feasts; what with weddings, and circumcisions, and other minor feasts, there is no end to luxurious living amongst these Mogadore Jews, and it is surprising to observe how the native Jew is advancing in the luxuries (what some would call the civilization) of European society, a hundred times more rapidly than the Moors.

With all this gaiety and splendor, these people suffer nevertheless many and great humiliations, as I have already mentioned. Even the British Jews, both from London and Gibraltar, find great difficulty in riding a horse or a mule through the streets of Mogadore, the Moors making all the native Jews dismount before they enter the gates of the city. It is singular, however, that because European Jews dress like the Christians, the Moors call them Christians, "Ensara." An English Jewess who had married a Jew of this country, was one day insulted by a Moorish boy, she resented it by striking the boy. The Moors flocked around her, and demanded how she dare to flog a true believer; she replied she would strike them also if they touched her. The Moors complained to her husband, who defended himself by saying, "My wife, you see, is an English woman!"

A great many Jews emigrate from this country to Portugal, whence they proceed to the Brazils and the colonial possessions of the Portuguese. They never return to Barbary, unless for a few weeks to visit their relatives.

I am sure a good number of Hebrew Bibles might be sold here, as well as Spanish.

Since Algiers has been a French colony, the Jews live dispersed all over the city; their old quarters still remaining, however, where there are still many families residing. The number of Jewish inhabitants in the city of Algiers is estimated at from 8,000 to 10,000. There are very few European Jews. The native, or Algerian Jews, despise these as persons having no religion, and in general are a fanatic race, like all Barbary Jews. There are some learned men amongst them, and the Chief Rabbi is a man of considerable consequence. He receives a salary from Government of some 4,000 francs per annum. The Government, indeed, pays the ministry of all religions in the country, and also builds and repairs all places of worship. There is now a synagogue being built for the Jews, and a Protestant church for the Protestants. In the whole of Algeria the Protestants amount to 2,000 souls. They have three ministers, one of whom is resident in this city, Monsieur Mauter.

The temporal circumstances of the Jews are as good as their neighbors; there are also some rich houses of commerce; most of the export trade is conducted by the Jews. Black is the color which the Jews of Barbary have been made to wear by their Mohammedan rulers. And now, although there is perfect liberty here for the Jews to dress as they please, the greater part of them still prefer their old custom of wearing black. Fourteen years—the time the French have been here—have not caused the Jews to change their old customs and prejudices. A good number, nevertheless, chiefly young people, have put on European clothing.

There seems to be no impediment whatever in the way of missionary labor amongst the Jews of this city. Bibles and all sorts of religious books are admitted into the country, paying a certain per centage.

DEATH OF A CHILD.

How touching and how beautiful is the following incident, descriptive of the death of a missionary's child in India! It is taken from a letter written by the Rev. Mr. Lawrence, at Dindigul. The little creature had only lived three years and a few days in this world of sorrow, and as it sunk to its repose on the bosom of its heavenly Father, its closing scene afforded a lovely type of the rest which remaineth for the people of God. Amongst our readers there are hearts that have been agonized, perhaps unduly, by a similar bereavement. It appears to us that this communication indicates the only true balsam for a such a wound. We copy it in their behalf, and commend it to their devout and grateful recognition.

"Dear Louisa went as calmly to her last repose, as the shutting up of a flower at twilight. As her sight began to fail, though about four o'clock in the afternoon, she said to me, 'Good night, papa,' her usual words on going to sleep, and then went on to repeat,

> 'Now I lay me down to sleep,
> I pray the Lord my soul to—ke—ee—p—
> A—a—men!'

and so she left us, to weep and rejoice; and now to long almost for a re-union; not here, O no, not here."

Blessed child—a more fitting prayer thou couldst not have offered, had thy lips been then, as now, the lips of an angel. Thou wert indeed lying down to sleep, and sweet shall be thy rest, for the Lord will keep thee; thou shalt sleep on his breast and wake in his arms.

She did not live to say,

> "If I should die before I wake,
> I pray the Lord my soul to take;"

but the Lord took her in the midst of her evening prayer, when she mistook the darkness of death gathering over her, for the shades of evening, and bidding her friends 'good night,' calmly committed her sweet spirit to her heavenly Father's care.

O that children would remember that touching incident when they kneel down to repeat those words. If the Lord takes your soul to-night, shall he take it home? [Epis. Recorder.

THE DIFFERENCE.

A Hindoo was lying upon his bed, expecting soon to die. He was full of thought where his soul would go after death. He had been wholly given to idolatry, and now he felt he was not happy. A priest came to see him, and the dying man said, "What will become of me?" "Oh," said the priest, "you will live in another body." "And where shall I go then?" he asked. "Into another." "And where then?" "Into another, and so on through thousands of millions." The thoughts of the dying man darted across all these many changes, as if they were but the work of an instant, and cried, "Where shall I go last of all?" The priest could not reply, and the unhappy idolator died with no one near him to answer his anxious question.

A little Burman girl was near death. Lifting her dim eyes to a kind lady who was her teacher, she said, "I am dying, but I am not afraid to die, for Christ will call me up to heaven. He has taken away all my sins, and I wish to die now that I may go and see him. I love Jesus more than any one else." What made the difference between the little Burman girl and the dying Hidoo? One had heard the gospel from the lips of the missionaries, and had received it into her heart; the other lived and died an idolater, for none had told him of "the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he has sent." NEW YORK, JAN. 9, 1845.

THE WORK OF THE MINISTRY.

Many persons suppose that the work of the ministry is an easy work, and may be performed by men of the most ordinary abilities. This supposition has received strength from the fact, that in many cases the work has been sought, and the ministerial office sustained, by men who were lovers of their own ease and possessed of small talents. But it will be found, nevertheless, that in order to discharge successfully the duties of a faithful minister of the Gospel, qualifications and exertions are demanded which equal those required in any other department of labor and usefulness.

Among the qualifications for the work of the ministry, the first is, of course, a heart renovated and sanctified by the grace of God, and earnestly devoted to the work. Whatever other qualifications may be possessed, if this be wanting there is little reason to hope that the work will be long continued or attended with much success. To this must be added sound principle and a thorough acquaintance with the sacred oracles of divine truth; the former as a protection against the multiplied temptations to which the minister is exposed, and the latter as a security against misleading those who may come under his influence. The whole must be under the control of a disposition which can be mild without indecision, courteous without servility, and conciliating without sacrificing the truth.

Such are some of the qualifications which the work of the ministry demands. Now let us look at some of the labors which it requires. They may be divided into two classes—those of the Preacher, and those of the Pastor.

It is the business of the Preacher to proclaim the will of God to man by public discourses upon the subject of religion; and it is through the instrumentality of this that God is pleased to save them that believe. The preacher who understands the design of his calling, and the responsibility which it lays upon him, will be diligent in studying and preparing the message which he has to deliver. He will feel that it is dangerous to be deceived himself or to deceive others in regard to the divine will. Hence he will be impelled to examine closely and prayerfully the sacred oracles, and endeavor to bring his instructions to correspond with them. No helps will be neglected or esteemed unimportant which are adapted to make him familiar with the spirit and design of the inspired authors; and when that is learned, nothing will induce him to withhold the truth from his hearers. The hours which a faithful preacher devotes to study and meditation preparatory to his public ministrations, will often be hours of the deepest anxiety; and a preacher who has had no experience of this, must surely have a low view of the responsibility of his calling. Nor will his anxiety cease when the preparation in his study has been completed. As he stands before his hearers, whose eternal destiny may be intimately connected with his influence over them, how carefully will he guard against whatever may diminish the attention of the hearer, and how earnestly endeavor to present the truth in the clearest and most forcible manner. His subject, his language, his manner, will be studied for the single purpose of giving effect to the message which he has to deliver. Piety, wisdom, diligence, and grace, are necessary to the work which such a preacher performs. Though this work may be a source of pleasure to him who enjoys in it the presence and approval of his Master, it will be far enough from what the world denominates an easy and flesh-pleasing work.

The minister's duty as a Preacher is scarcely more important than as a Pastor. It is in the performance of this part of his work, that he is brought into contact with his flock, and may become in truth the gentle shepherd. Those who have been long members of the church often need his direction or admonition, while those who have but just commenced a Christian life need his support and encouragement. It is not enough that men are brought to acknowledge the truth, or even to make a profession of it; they need watchful care, and sometimes faithful personal instruction. By giving this, a minister may often make a more lasting and salutary impression than by many learned discourses. In addition to this, it should be remembered that the success of preaching is greatly promoted by such an acquaintance with the wants of the people as can only be obtained through pastoral faithfulness. He who mingles with the people of his charge, and knows their individual trials and encouragements, can hardly fail of reaching their hearts in his public ministrations. A simple word thus fitly spoken may sometimes touch a spring of action which will continue to vibrate for years. Hence it has happened, that in many cases a faithful pastor, who was not remarkable as a preacher, has been the instrument of building up a church and converting sinners from the error of their ways, where distinguished preachers without pastoral faithfulness have failed. In view of such facts, the importance of the pastoral work is apparent. Yet it cannot be performed successfully without great diligence and frequent self-denial. The superficial talk and worse than useless gossip which so often takes its place, will not secure the design of pastoral visitation. This only makes the real work to be done more difficult. It must be entered upon systematically, and continued with perseverance and consistency, in order to secure any thing deserving the name of success.

The work of the ministry, if these suggestions are correct, is a most arduous work, and may well call for the highest exercise of the best abilities. But although it is arduous, it has its pleasures likewise; and these are liberally bestowed upon the faithful and true. Yet we envy not the man who engages in it for the sake of ease, any more than we approve the man who holds back from it on account of its toils.

IMPORTANT RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT.

The late European magazines contain accounts of a conference of about one hundred and sixty literary and theological professors and clergymen, lately held at St. Gall in Switzerland, at which Dr. D'Aubigné, author of the popular History of the Reformation, a man of enlarged views and great influence, presented the following proposition:—

"That this conference regard it as highly desirable that all evangelical Christians, who hold the mystery of godliness, 'the Lord our righteousness,' should unite in a common confession of their faith, and thereby manifest, in contrast with the apparent unity of the Roman Catholic Church, their true and spiritual unity; and that, for the attainment of this end, a committee be appointed to correspond with some of the pastoral conferences recently established in Germany, and with the churches of France, Great Britain, Holland, and America; and farther, that the said committee be enjoined to prepare a draft of an evangelical confession of the nineteenth century, which shall contain the fundamental truths of the Word of God, embodied at present in all confessions of the Protestant faith, and present these in a form adapted to the times in which we live."

This proposition is said to have been received by the Conference with general approbation, and the subject was accordingly placed in the hands of an appropriate committee. It can hardly fail of being an occasion of joy to every Christian, that a proposition originating from so high a source has received the approval of such a Conference. If the report and confession here proposed shall be of such a character as to promote kindliness of feeling among the different branches of the Christian Church, the movement will equal in importance any thing since the days of Luther. The right platform is here proposed, "the fundamental truths of the Word of God." We apprehend, however, that a confession of faith which strictly conforms to this, will differ very widely from any at present in existence. It must reject many things which Protestants now practice, and of which Rome boldly claims the exclusive proprietorship. The confession is designed to meet the claim of the Catholic Church to unity, and must therefore be guarded on these points. We shall look anxiously for the result of the movement.

THE JEWS AND THE SABBATH.

The attachment of all pious Jews to the Sabbath is proverbial. It matters not in what country such persons may be placed, or by what circumstances surrounded, when the day of rest returns it is joyfully remembered and conscientiously observed. But there is a large class of Jews to whom the sacred duties of the day are irksome, and who therefore very easily fall into the habits of the community around them, to the neglect of the divine commandment. This fact has led some of the leaders of that people to protest earnestly against the evil and endeavor to secure a reform. The question was brought before the recent conference of Jewish Rabbins in Europe, and has since been more or less discussed in the Jewish periodicals. The object seems to be, to secure a more strict observance of the day—such an observance of it as will compare favorably with the regard paid to the first day of the week among the strictest Christian sects.

We are glad to see this movement going on, not only because we know it to be right and needful, but because we believe it will serve to bring before the minds of Christians their duty in reference to this matter. It is well known to every person who has been familiar with the Jews, that the neglect of Christians to keep the Sabbath has always been an obstacle in the way of their receiving Christianity. The Sabbath has ever been sacred to the mind of a Jew. He has seen the solemnity with which it was instituted in Paradise by the Creator's resting from his work. He has inferred from the manner of its institution, what we have been taught by the Son of God, that it was designed for all men. He has seen it introduced among the Commandments of the Decalogue, which, from their nature, he supposes were to be binding to the end of time. He has observed the regard which God had for the institution, in the fact that throughout his nation's story, every blessing followed its observance, and every curse its neglect. He has been assured by Christians, that Jesus Christ came not to destroy the law or the prophets, but to fulfil. Yet after having known and heard all these things, he finds the Christian Church both pronouncing sacred the first day of the week, and neglecting the seventh, which God had set apart as the Sabbath. And while he has thought upon these facts, without inquiring into the history of the change, but receiving the common opinion that it was done by the authority of Jesus Christ, he has felt authorized to conclude, that this cannot be the long-expected Messiah who should come to fulfil the law and the prophets and to do the Father's will. Thus the practice of Christians becomes to him an occasion of stumbling; and he is led to conclude, that his own persecutions, the baptized idolatries of the Christian Church, and the neglect of the Sabbath, are the natural and necessary fruits of Christianity. Is it surprising, in such circumstances, that he rejects it? Should the Jews become strict observers of the Sabbath, and free themselves from the charge of inconsistency, it would do much to bring the subject before Christians. For this reason, among others, we rejoice in the movements which are going on.

Delia Webster.—It is stated in the Frankfort (Ky.) Commonwealth, that Gov. Owsley has refused to pardon Miss Webster, and that she will therefore be sent to the Penitentiary for the term specified in her sentence, which was two years.

CONVICTION OF BISHOP ONDERDONK.

The trial of the Episcopal Bishop of New York, on the charge of immoral and licentious conduct, has been brought to a close. There were present at its conclusion seventeen bishops—besides the three who presented his case, but had no vote on the question of guilt or innocence. The vote stood, eleven for conviction and six opposed to conviction. The vote on the sentence, after three ballotings, stood, nine for suspension, and eight for deposition—the six who at first pronounced the Bishop not guilty, concurring in and producing the sentence of suspension, probably in order to prevent a higher penalty. The sentence was accordingly passed of "suspension from the office of a Bishop in the Church of God, and from all the functions of the sacred ministry." Before the sentence was given, the accused appeared and delivered an address to the Court in excuse or palliation, in which he did not deny the facts in the presentment, but pleaded innocence of any immoral or impure intent. A committee was appointed to superintend the publication of the proceedings, evidence, pleadings, &c., so that the whole matter will be officially laid before the public in a few days. It is said that the Bishop's friends look upon the result with great dissatisfaction. Yet we are not aware that there is any way in which they think it can be changed.

There seems to be a difference of opinion as to the effect which will follow the Bishop's suspension, some maintaining that the way is now open for the election of another man to fill his place, while others contend that the office is not vacant. If the latter view be correct, then the diocese must continue for an indefinite period to pay the salary of a man who has been pronounced guilty of such immoralities as disqualify him for the performance of his episcopal functions. In either case, we think the church is about as bad off as it would be without a Bishop.

THE ISRAELITES AND THE GOVERNOR OF S. C.

The "Occident" for the present month contains a very consistent expression of the feelings and sentiments of the Israelites of South Carolina in relation to the Thanksgiving Proclamation of Gov. Hammond, to which we referred at the time. They complain that his excellency excluded them from a participation in the exercises of the day, by an unconstitutional restriction, viz. that they should offer their devotions to Jesus Christ. They quote the Constitution of South Carolina, (Art. 8, Sec. 1,) which says, 'The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever hereafter be allowed within this State to all mankind.' The Governor invites and exhorts all citizens, of all denominations, to assemble at their respective places of worship, to offer up their devotions to God their Creator, and his Son Jesus Christ, the Redeemer of the world. The following extract from a letter addressed to him by one hundred Jews, exhibits their views of the matter:—

"You have thus obviously excluded the Israelites of South Carolina from a participation in the religious observances of the occasion. To do this, you have adopted a phraseology as unusual as it is offensive. No casuistry, however subtle—no constructions, however ingenious—can bring the mind to any other conclusion. It is true, you exhort our citizens of all denominations to assemble at their respective places of worship, and had you stopped there, you would have been clearly within the legitimate sphere of your official duty. But, sir, you go further; and state the particular creed upon which your excellency would have all these denominations to unite!—all are invited to offer up their devotions to God, the Creator, AND his Son Jesus Christ, the Redeemer of the world. To invite one to do that which you know his conscience forbids, if not a mockery of his feelings, is certainly not far removed from an insult to his understanding; but yet you must have known, that to a respectable portion of your constituents your invitation presented no other features.

"Sir, the Israelites of Charleston, while they hold in all proper respect all other denominations of their fellow-citizens, profess themselves a God-serving and prayerful people. They cherish with unfaltering devotion their ancient and holy religion. They contemplate with veneration its sublime truths; they rely with calm confidence upon its glorious and inspiring promises. They, too, in common with all others of the human family, have bowed their heads in humble submission beneath the chastening rod of their Creator, and in their turn have also had cause to gratefully acknowledge bounteous blessings bestowed by his benificent hand. Judge then, sir, what must have been their emotions when they found themselves excluded by your Proclamation, from the general thanksgiving and prayer for the occasion."

To this letter the Governor replied, insisting on the correctness of his position; on which account a meeting of Israelites was held on the 16th November, at which an able reply to the Governor's letter was adopted.

Lamentable.—In a late number of the London Review, an able Episcopal paper, it is stated that two of the most distinguished prelates of the English church, the Bishops of London and Exeter, give no evidence of being experimentally acquainted with the doctrines of grace. The latter gentleman is characterized as a spiritual tyrant who needs to be constantly held in check. If such be the true state of the case—and it is asserted to be upon high authority—the recent developments of the spirit of Romanism in the English Church, are not at all surprising, however lamentable they may be.

Education in the West.—A society was formed in the East some time since for the promotion of theological education in the West, especially by assisting several needy but important institutions, which had been established within a few years. From the first annual report of the society, it appears that $170,000 have been received during the year, which is certainly a generous response to the appeals which have been made. This sum falls short, however, by some thousands of dollars, of what the real exigencies of the institutions demand. It is sincerely to be hoped, that the importance of the object will secure for it the continued support of the liberal and pious; and that the expectations which have been awakened by this year's contributions will not be disappointed.

Tracts at the West.—A friend in Michigan writes as follows:—"The Sabbath Tracts you sent are doing great good here, and I wish I was able to buy thousands of them. I have lectured somewhat upon the subject, and purpose to spend considerable time this winter in the same way, and in distributing all the tracts I can obtain. The public mind here is fully awake to the subject. I find, however, that it is much easier to bring men to an acknowledgment of the truth, than to obedience to it. The power of association, of preconceived opinion, of the love of popularity, and the desire to be in fashion, is almost irresistible. But let us not be discouraged. Let us sow the seed, morning and evening; in due time we shall reap if we faint not."

Special Prayer.—In compliance with a recommendation of the Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and also of several ecclesiastical bodies, the first Monday in January was made a season of special prayer for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit at home and abroad, and for the conversion of the world. The present aspects of the missionary enterprise are very encouraging. During the past year many barriers to the spread of the Gospel have been removed, an unusual spirit of inquiry has been apparent in some parts of the world, and cheering success has in many places attended missionary labors. These facts cannot fail to give interest to such season of special prayer.

Jewish Publication Society.—Several members of the Jewish community have recently appointed a Provisional Committee preparatory to the formation of an American Jewish Publication Society. They say they were impelled to this course by the efforts made to diffuse false views concerning their faith among the Gentiles, and by the fact that erroneous views have been extensively propagated among their own people through books, tracts, and other publications. It is proposed to issue a series of works in a cheap pocket form calculated to diffuse correct information concerning their religion. One work has already been issued, accompanied with an appeal for aid to carry out the enterprise.

An Inquiry.—Will some brother give me light upon the question, whether it is right for a church to rent its slips annually to raise money to defray the incidental expenses of the church; or whether the money can better be raised in some other way?

New London, Ct., Jan. 2, 1845. Inquirer.

Andover Theological Seminary.—We have received a Catalogue of this venerable institution for the present year, from which we obtain the following statistics: Resident Licentiates 8; Senior Class 30; Middle Class 18; Junior Class 30; Total 86.

Anti-Rent Troubles.—Since our last, several other persons have been apprehended in Columbia County, and the jail at Hudson has been guarded by the military companies from Albany and New York. The Evening Post of Monday says that anti-rent meetings have been called in Gallatin, Hinsdale, Germantown, and Clermont. It is also stated that as Mrs. Van Rensselaer, wife of Wm. Van Rensselaer, one of the proprietors of the Rensselaer manor, was riding in her carriage, a party of 'Indians' stopped the horses, unharnessed them, and debated by the roadside whether or no they should carry off the lady. The question was decided in the negative, much to the lady's satisfaction.

Choctaws.—It is cheering to learn that the saving influences of the Holy Spirit continue to attend the preaching of the Gospel among the Choctaws. Many persons have been awakened and renewed during the past year, among whom are some men of considerable influence in the nation.

Religion Among the Cherokees.—The five churches under the care of the Cherokee Mission (says the Missionary Herald for January) embrace two hundred and forty members. About one hundred and fifty dollars have been raised by the natives during the past year for the distribution of the Scriptures among their own people. The Temperance Society embraces about twenty-three hundred members; and this cause is advancing in the nation. They have made provisions for sustaining eighteen free schools from their own funds. The mission has under its care one boarding school, and other pupils amounting to about one hundred and seventy. At the mission press 1,586,000 pages have been printed for the past year. The Cherokees have purchased a press and types, which are used for printing a newspaper, partly in their own language and partly in the English.

Missouri Indians.—These Indians are estimated by the Cherokee Advocate as follows:—Delawares, 1,000; Shawnees, 1,000; Potawatomies, 5,000; Kickapoos, 600; Ottawas, 200; Peories, 100; Weas, 200; Ojibwas, 50; Munsies, 75; Stockbridges, 75. They are represented as peaceful and prosperous. "You may see handsome farms, covered with abundant crops of grain, and comfortable log cabins and large herds of cattle and hogs, almost wherever you find a Shawnee, a Delaware, or a Kickapoo family. The Munsies, Stockbridges and Wyandots are also doing well in these matters."

Religious Discussion.—The political newspapers of England are taking an active part in the consideration of religious topics, and the subject of a Convocation to consider the propriety of altering the Rubrics is warmly discussed.

CHRISTIAN REFORM CONVENTION.

The friends of Christian Progress and Ecclesiastical Reform are invited to meet in Convention at Syracuse, on Wednesday and Thursday, January 22d and 23d, 1845, to discuss such religious subjects as the times seem to require, to devise and adopt measures for promoting a spirit of investigation and inquiry, for diffusing, more extensively, by means of the press or otherwise, a knowledge of primitive church order, and in general, to seek, by mutual consultation and prayer, the revival of a purified Christianity throughout the land and the earth. The Convention to be opened at 10 o'clock, A. M., on Wednesday, the 22d.

We clip the above notice from the Liberty Press, published at Utica, N. Y., where are appended to it the names of about twenty distinguished individuals, among whom are Gerrit Smith and Wm. Goodell. It is gratifying to see in these days a disposition to promote a spirit of investigation and inquiry upon religious subjects. We sincerely hope that our friends in that vicinity will attend the deliberations of the Convention.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

The following items are copied from the Missionary Herald for January, and will be read with interest. They show an encouraging state of things in several stations of the American Board.

Constantinople.—Mr. Hamlin writes, September 21, that amid a good deal of opposition, the work in which the missionaries are engaged, is full of promise; it is going forward, not by might nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord. He says, "We hope to receive in all five, hopefully pious young men into the Seminary this fall."

Trebizond.—Mr. Bliss, under date of October 21, says, "We are now enjoying a good degree of quiet in our work. Persecution sleeps, and our friends among the Armenians come to our house with considerable freedom. I hold a regular service every Sunday morning, and preach as well as my imperfect knowledge of the language will allow. The number present is usually about twenty."

Syria.—Letters have been received from Thomson and Calhoun, dated October 9, from which it appears that the Protestants of Hasbeiya, who were recently obliged to leave the village on account of persecution, have returned with the promise of safety and quiet. The Emir who took so active a part against them, has been deposed, and another Governor has been appointed, with express instructions to restore them to their homes and protect them. In view of these facts, Mr. Calhoun says, "A wider door than ever has been opened for preaching the gospel, and herein we do and will rejoice."

Bombay.—In a letter dated August 12, Mr. Hume mentions the commencement of a weekly religious newspaper, called the Bombay Witness. It is highly evangelical in its character, and promises to be very useful. It is printed at the mission press. A monthly temperance paper was about to be commenced, to be printed also at the mission press. "Intemperance is spreading among the natives. Hundreds of grog shops are now kept and supported by them; more of these places are kept by Parsees than by any other class." Considerable effort, however, is made to secure the prevalence of temperance principles, and not wholly without success.

Ahmednuggur.—Mr. Burgess, writing from Ahmednuggur, September 28th, says, "Two persons were baptized a few weeks since; and five or six others have been propounded, and will probably be admitted to the church in a few days. There are others still whom we regard as hopeful candidates for baptism; and quite a spirit of inquiry exists among some classes of the people. The prospects of the mission were never more flattering."

The Plymouth Brethren.—A religious party has sprung up within a few years in England, bearing this name, from the fact that it originated in Plymouth. By one of their friends it is said, that they are spreading through all parts of the Kingdom, and are thoroughly evangelical in their views, and as a body, remarkable for their piety; that numbers of various religious bodies, have joined them, even some of the evangelical clergymen of the Church of England—but the bulk of their number consists of Independents and Baptists. Their peculiarities are, that they reject any official or special ministry, and hold to the right of every male member, so disposed, to address the church. They have neither pulpit nor gallery in their houses of worship—and seats are rent free. Their only test of membership is, a simple profession of faith in Christ, accompanied by a blameless walk and conversation; and in their public services they proceed on the assumption, that all who are present, are saints of God. [Boston Recorder.

More Trouble in the Episcopal Church.—We find in the Episcopal Recorder, published at Philadelphia, an article headed 'Recent Developments in New York,' in which it is stated that a sort of conspiracy has been discovered amongst some of the members of the General Theological Seminary in this City, the object of which appears to be to render the institution, as far as practicable, subservient to the principles and policy of Rome. It is said that the association has its common seal, with C. U. (Catholic Unity) upon it, its secret meetings, and its correspondence with the Papal authorities in this vicinity. The Recorder states that the 7th of January has been appointed for the trial of the offenders by the Faculty, and calls upon the Bishops to meet the solemn responsibilities which such developments devolve upon them as the visitors of the General Theological Seminary of the Church. [N. Y. Tribune.

The Late Dr. Worcester.—The remains of this distinguished missionary and divine, have been removed from their place of interment at Brainerd, a former missionary station among the Cherokees, and desposited in the Cemetery at Harmony Grove, Mass. Dr. Worcester was pastor of the Tabernacle Church in Salem, and first Corresponding Secretary of the A. B. F. M. He was born November 1, 1770, and died June 7, 1821.

Division of the M. E. Church.—The North Carolina Annual Conference of this body have unanimously agreed to the proposed division, by adopting the report of the committee on the subject, embodying resolutions to the effect that the time has come for the ministers of the M. E. Church to refuse to act in union with the North, and that the Conference elect delegates to the proposed convention at Louisville, Ky., in May, 1845.

General Intelligence.

NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.

Albany, Tuesday, Jan. 7, 1845.

The two branches of the Legislature convened at the Capitol this day.

The SENATE met at 11 o'clock. The Governor's Message was received, read, and ordered printed. The customary resolutions as to chaplains, newspapers, &c. were adopted; when the Senate adjourned.

The HOUSE was called to order at 10 A. M. by James R. Rose, Esq., Clerk of the last Assembly, and the roll called. The oath of office having been administered to the members present by the Secretary of State, the House proceeded to organize. Horatio Seymour, of Oneida, was chosen Speaker on the first ballot. James R. Rose, of Albany, was appointed Clerk. David B. Groat, of Otsego, Sergeant-at-arms. E. B. Fenn, of Delaware, Door-keeper. I. R. Neahr, of Montgomery, Assistant Door-keeper. John B. Sheldon, of Allegany, second Assistant Door-keeper. The Message of the Governor was received, and read; after which the House adjourned.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

This document is fourteen columns long—too long, of course, for us to give entire.

It commences with a full exposition of the financial condition of the State, which is somewhat burdened, but yet sound, and "by no means desperate."

The condition of Common Schools is encouraging, as will be seen from the following extract:

"The productive capital of the Common School Fund was, on the 30th day of September last, $1,992,916 35, and the revenue of the fund, received into the Treasury during the last fiscal year, amounted to $133,826,51.

The number of school districts in the State, organized according to the school law, is 10,990, from 10,857 of which regular reports were received during the last year, showing that the average time, during which schools were kept open in these districts was eight months. The whole number of children between the ages of five and sixteen years, residing in the State, estimating those residing in the City of New York at 80,000, was 696,548; and the whole number of children actually taught in the district schools of the State was 709,156 being more than 50,000 beyond the number taught during the preceeding year. The whole amount of money distributed from the treasury of the State for the use of the common schools for that year, was $275,000, and the amount actually paid during the year, for the wages of common school teachers, was $992,222 03. The number of volumes reported as being in the school district libraries, was 1,038,396. These returns also show, that 37,531 scholars had been, during some portion of the year, in attendance upon private and select schools, out of the City of New York, and it is estimated that at least an equal number were in attendance upon like schools in that city, making more than 65,000 children thus taught, not including those taught in the academies and other incorporated literary institutions."

The Message speaks of dissatisfaction in certain sections with the substitution of County Superintendents for town Commissioners. It also expresses some apprehension that the new institution for educating teachers under the patronage of the State may introduce injurious distinctions among teachers.

The Charities of the State are generally in a flourishing condition. So of the Penitentiaries.

The necessity of some additional laws to prevent fraud in elections is referred to; betting upon elections is severely rebuked; and preventive measures are recommended.

The Anti-Rent Difficulties are discussed at considerable length. After speaking very considerately of the supposed grievances of the tenants and the landlords, this part of the Message closes with the following language:—

"I have already said, that I feel precluded from discussing what I understand to be the real questions between the proprietors and the tenants, so long as the present position of the controversy on the part of the tenants is maintained, as it excludes all idea of arrangement, amicable or legal, upon any basis which has suggested itself to me as within my power of recommendation. Indeed, not merely the questions but the parties to the controversy, have been practically changed by the violent proceedings alluded to; and it now becomes my duty to call your attention to a struggle going on between a band of desperate men, who disguise their persons, and with arms in their hands, bid defiance to the law and its officers, on the one side, and the constituted authorities of the State, exerting the powers conferred upon them to preserve the peace, defend the rights, and protect the lives of the citizens, on the other. In such a controversy there is but one side for the faithful public officer to take, whatever may be his office, or the trust confided to him; and as upon me rests the express constitutional obligation to 'take care that the laws are faithfully executed,' which obligation I have sworn faithfully to discharge, I have no choice left, even were I inclined, as I trust I am not, to doubt or hesitate. The laws must be executed. The rights of all must be respected. The public peace must be preserved. The lives of our peaceful fellow-citizens must be protected; and crimes must be prevented or punished. So far as the law as it now is clothes me with power to secure the accomplishment of these objects, or so far as it shall be your pleasure to confer additional authority, I hope to be able to exert it calmly and dispassionately, but with vigilance and firmness; and aided and sustained by the great body of our common constituents, as I am sure I shall be, I do not entertain a doubt of complete success. Indeed, I indulge the earnest hope that already the crisis is past; that the events which have transpired have opened the eyes of those who were looked to for aid and support by these desperate perpetrators of crime, and made it certain that no farther outrages will be committed through their countenance or co-operation. If this reasonable hope shall be disappointed, still the laws must be executed, fall where they may, and effect whom they may.

Permit me to suggest, in conclusion of this subject, whether the facts here presented, and others constantly appearing before the public, should not induce you so to provide for the prevention and punishment of crime, as to enable the officers of justice to reach him who disguises his person for the purpose of committing crime with less exposure to detecton."

In conclusion, the Governor refers with satisfaction to the interests of our State as a member of the Union; to the result of the late election; and to the prospect of "security and peace for our constituents and prosperity for the State."

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

[Compiled for the Recorder.]

Monday, Dec. 30.

In the Senate, Mr. Sevier announced the death of his late colleague, the Hon. W. S. Fulton, in August last; and, after the usual resolutions, an adjournment took place.

The House adjourned for the same reason, after passing the joint resolution providing for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensions.

Tuesday, Dec. 31.

SENATE.—Several unimportant resolutions were passed; the bill to establish the Smithsonian Institute, and the bill to grant certain public lands to Indiana for the purpose of extending the Wabash and Erie canals, were discussed; after which the Senate went into executive sesion, and shortly after adjourned till Thursday.

HOUSE.—Mr. Tibbatts gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill authorizing the people of Texas to establish a State Government and to provide for the admission of the State so constituted, into the Union, upon an equality with the other States, and also a Joint Resolution guaranteeing to the People of Texas the protection of the United States until the question of Annexation be decided.

Mr. Belser gave notice of his intention to introduce a joint resolution for the Annexation of Texas.

Numerous reports were made, among which was one to grant certain lands to the State of Indiana for the purpose extending canals to the Ohio river; another for the improvement of the Hudson river.

After the introduction of several resolutions, and notices of intention to introduce bills, the House adjourned till Thursday.

Thursday, Jan. 2, 1845.

SENATE.—Several private bills were passed, and the Senate went into executive session until time to adjourn.

HOUSE.—Considerable discussion arose from Mr. Tibbatts asking leave to introduce a bill for the annexation of Texas.

A resolution to print 5000 copies of the Report of a Select Committee upon the Memorial of the Democratic members of the Legislature of R. I. was passed.

Several executive documents were laid before the House; and the bill to graduate and reduce the price of public lands was discussed till adjournment.

Friday, Jan. 3.

The Senate was not in session.

In the House, the Joint Resolutions from the Committee on Foreign Relations for annexing Texas to the Union, were taken up. They were in the exact terms of the rejected treaty. After yielding the floor for two or three amendments to be offered,

Mr. C. J. Ingersoll spoke for an hour on the subject. He took it for granted that the recent Presidential canvass gave a decision in favor of immediate annexation. He contended that the question of annexation was a southern question—a slave question; that there was nothing to be feared from extending the borders of the Union; that annexation was favorable to the termination of Slavery; that our country had a right to Texas; that there would be no rupture with Mexico, nor with Great Britain, nor with France; and that peace would be the consequence of the measure. He was in the midst of his speech when his hour expired.

Mr. Belser, of Ala., next took the floor, and urged the necessity, safety, and justice of immediate action in the case. He was for vesting the whole subject with the President until Congress assembled again. The subject of slavery was glanced at, and the responsibility of the evil, charged upon the compact. The speech closed with a flourish about the area of the country in time to come. After which, the Committee rose and reported progress.

A bill was introduced for the extension of the jurisdiction of the United States over Texas, and making Texas a State of the Union. Another for tendering the protection of the United States to the people of Texas, until the question of annexation is definitely settled. These projects were referred, and the House adjourned,

Saturday, Jan. 4.

The HOUSE was again occupied with a debate on the Texas question. Nearly all the speakers were in favor of annexation. Mr. Winthrop of Mass. had the floor when the House adjourned.

POST-OFFICE BILL.—We have a copy of Mr. Harden's new Post-Office Bill. According to it, the rates of postage are thus defined. Five cents for prepaid letters, for a distance not exceeding five hundred miles, and for a greater distance ten cents; for double letters, double postage; for treble letters, treble postage; for quadruple letters or one ounce weight, quadruple postage; and an additional single postage for each half ounce; and double these rates if the postage be not prepaid. Newspapers to be sent in the county in which they are published free of postage; and if not more than 1,250 square inches, to be charged half cent, sent not over 100 miles, or to any Post-Office in the State wherein printed; and over 100 miles, or if out of the State, one cent, with an additional quarter cent for each additional 250 or part of 250 square inches.

Publishers to send their papers, if they wish, by other than mail conveyances; double these rates for papers sent to other than subscribers or to news-venders. A pamphlet of 16 pages, 10 by 6, or 60 square inches, in the State wherein published, one cent; for 100 miles or more out of it, two cents, with a proportional decrease of postage on the size. The President and Ex-Presidents, Members of both Houses, &c., free correspondence; $750,000 to be appropriated for sustaining the present mails, and increasing them as required. After five years, the departmental correspondence, except the Post-Office Department, to be charged with ordinary postage. These are the main provisions of the bill. [Phila. Ledger.

NEW YORK BIBLE SOCIETY.—During the past year this Society has distributed 6973 Bibles and 6908 Testaments. Whole number distributed 169,185, in eighteen languages. During the past year it has paid over to the American Bible Society $3855 for Bibles and Testaments, and $1640 as a donation.

ARRIVAL OF MR. CUSHING—NEWS FROM MEXICO.—Hon. Caleb Cushing, late Commissioner to China, arrived in New York on the 31st ult. from Vera Cruz, which place he left on the 12th ult. Mr. Cushing has enjoyed uninterrupted health since he left the United States, and has fully succeeded, it is said, in the designs of his mission. He brought with him but few newspapers, having been robbed while in Mexico of all his papers, except those of an official character, which he carried about his person. Mr. C. proceeded immediately to Washington.

The news from Mexico is, that most of the principal towns throughout the republic, and a very large proportion of the people, have joined the insurrection against Santa Anna, which has become a successful but bloodless revolution. Santa Anna has a few faithful adherents, but most of the troops have gone over to Paredes. His case is thought to be desperate, and he may possibly have to fly from the country.

THE INAUGURATION.—The Albany Argus of Friday last says:—The opening of the new-year, always a high holiday, was duly commemorated in this ancient city.

The GOVERNOR and LIEUT. GOVERNOR elect proceeded to the Executive Chamber at 10 o'clock, A. M. and signed the oath of office. They then ascended the staircase in the hall of the Capitol, and there the oath was administered to them, by the Secretary of State, in the presence of the judicial and state officers, the Senators and such members of the Assembly as had arrived in the city, and a large concourse of citizens and strangers.

Gov. Wright and Lieut. Gov. Gardiner were then conducted to the Executive Chamber by Gov. Bouck, where they received the visits of a very large number of citizens and strangers, who were presented by Col. Hamilton, one of the Governor's aids. Indeed, the crowd was undiminished from 10 in the morning until three in the afternoon.

Gov. Wright's mansion on Clinton square, as well as that of Gov. Bouck, and many prominent citizens, was thronged with visitors.

The new Senators elect who were in attendance were sworn into office in the Senate Chamber by the Secretary of State—the Court for the Correction of Errors being in session—and took their seats as members of that body.

FROM LAGUYRA.—We have intelligence from Laguyra to the 4th. ult. The insurgents in the neighborhood of Lezuma have not yet surrendered; they have fled to the woods and the mountains, and are said to be about 200 strong. The military are at work endeavoring to dislodge and capture them, and there is little doubt that they will be prevented from doing farther mischief. The President has issued a proclamation, offering pardon to all who will return peaceably to their homes.

A NEGRO KILLED.—A negro belonging to Mr. Allen Barnes, of Columbia, Marion county, Miss., was found dead in the woods, in the vicinity of that place, lately, with a bullet-hole through his head. Previous rash remarks made by one of the citizens of that county, and his known hostility to the owner of the negro, together with other corroborating circumstances, have caused suspicions to be rested upon him; but he has stated, so we are privately informed, that he shot the negro very early in the morning, before it was light enough to distinguish clearly one object from another, mistaking his head for a wild turkey!—Planter's (Miss.) Free Press.

THE STEAMER MOUNT PLEASANT.—This steamboat, which left New York on the 10th ult. for our city, it will be remembered, has not been heard from since. The brig Martha, Capt. Parker, from Boston to Baltimore, where she arrived yesterday, on the 31st. ult., in lat. 38 30, lon. 70 30, saw the broadside of a steamboat with her stern knocked off, so that the name could not be seen. The wreck will probably prove to be all that remains of the fated boat and her hapless crew, as they have doubtless found graves in the "deep, deep sea."—Philadelphia Gazette.

SLAVERY IN KENTUCKY.—A letter in the Vermont Chronicle, from a respectable citizen in Louisville says,

"I know the real sentiments of most of our leading men, and I believe next year a decided step will be taken to amend the Constitution of Kentucky, with a view to the extirpation of Slavery; it is ruining us as a people, impoverishing us as a state, and poisoning our public and private morals."

RUTGERS COLLEGE, NEW BRUNSWICK.—The committee who were appointed to obtain funds for the full endowment of Rutgers College have published the names of those who have subscribed for that purpose. The whole amount subscribed is $29,080, of which $13,769 have been paid to the treasurer of the College. The sums subscribed are from one dollar to one thousand. Four subscribed one thousand dollars; seven five hundred; one four hundred; two three hundred; thirty-four two hundred and fifty; six two hundred; three one hundred and twenty five; fifty-three one hundred; one eighty; forty-five fifty; two forty; one thirty; forty-two twenty five; twenty-two twenty; eight fifteen; eighty-five, ten, and the residue was subscribed in smaller sums.

CHEROKEE NEWS.—A Cherokee named William was frozen to death near Maysville, (Ark.) a few weeks ago, while intoxicated. The Cherokee Advocate mourns over the sale of poison to the Indians. It is reported that Bear Starr, one of the triumvirate whose names have been made notorious by their diabolical deeds, was killed about two weeks ago, at the house of William Harris, in the Choctaw Nation. He is said to have been shot three times by a company of Cherokees, who went out in pursuit of stolen horses, horse thieves and murderers.

GEORGE GUESS.—This individual was the inventor of the Cherokee alphabet. The Council of his nation have allowed him an annual pension for many years. In the summer of 1842, "influenced perhaps by a desire to explore the western prairies and become acquainted with his red brethren," he loaded several pack horses with goods and visited the Comanche Indians. Thence he proceeded to northern Mexico, where he spent some time in teaching the inhabitants his native language. His subsequent journeyings are not known. The Cherokee Advocate supposes that he sleeps "full of years, and of honors, in some wild and unknown spot, far from his wife, his country and his people."

PAUL BECK.—The late Paul Beck, Esq. of Philadelphia made bequests to forty-eight charitable and other societies in that City, amounting to $35,500. To the soup societies of Philadelphia he left a ground rent of $300 per annum, and also one of $500 per annum for distribution of fuel to the poor.

SUMMARY.

Four children in a single family, in Ohio, died with malignant scarlet fever, brought on mainly by their eating freely of rotten or unsound apples, which were buried and dug up for winter consumption. Three of the cases were attacked by vomiting soon after eating the apples.

THE BLACK TONGUE has lately prevailed in some towns in Lewis county, in that state; but its malignancy seems much moderated, for we understand that out of fifty cases but two have died. In Gibson county, Ia., it is said to be raging with great malignity. A great number of deaths have occurred—some cases proving fatal in four or five days from the first attack.

The Secretary of the American Temperance Union, in company with Mr. Gough, will commence a series of Temperance meetings on the 4th, at Philadelphia, similar to those held in this City. They propose, also, being at Harrisburg on the 8th, and at Trenton on the 22d.

At the Court of Common Pleas at Cambridge, Margaret K. Russell, a minor, brought an action, through James O. Curtis, her guardian, against J. Q. A. Russell, for slander, in words spoken against her fair fame, and recovered damages to the amount of eighteen hundred dollars.

At this time the interest due to the Smithsonian Bequest Fund, by the Treasurer of the United States, amounts to $182,000, and the whole fund to $690,000. It will be a matter for earnest discussion during the present session of Congress, as to the best means of applying this money.

In the New England States the whole number of newspapers published is 270. Of this number, 130 were published in Massachusetts, 48 in Maine, 37 in New Hampshire, 28 in Vermont, and 14 in Rhode Island.

The Ohio House of Representatives, have rescinded the resolutions passed in the session of 1841—'42 censuring John Quincy Adams for presenting a petition for the dissolution of the Union. The vote was yeas 40, nays 21

The Rochester Democrat says that three hundred and ten new buildings have been erected in that city during the past year, of which two hundred and twenty-five were private dwellings.

At the last session of the New York Legislature, a law was passed reducing the compensation of the officers of the Assembly. The compensation of the sergeant at arms was fixed at $2,50 per diem, that of the door keeper at $1,50, and the messengers or pages 50 cents.

A mechanic of Baltimore, George J. Haydar, has invented a new order of Architecture, which he calls the "Crystaline." The design consists in the application of the simple and beautiful forms of crystals to an order of architecture as evolved in the delineation of the octagon, applying any polygonal figures or multilateral figures varying in form, as the principles appertaining to one will apply generally to the other.

Col. Benjamin Fowler, one of the gallant defenders of Baltimore, who so nobly distinguished himself as commander of the 39th regiment at the battle of North Point, died at Georgetown, D. C. on the 1st inst. His remains were taken to Annapolis for interment, and the House of Delegates of Maryland adjourned to attend his funeral.

Gov. Porter of Pennsylvania, has pardoned since he has been in power (6 years) 63 criminals, of whom 29 were convicted for murder, 18 of manslaughter, and 16 of burglary. It is said the number of those convicted of minor crimes, who are pardoned, is much greater.

TEETOTALISM IN WHALESHIPS.—The ship C. W. Morgan lately arrived at New Bedford, when, as is the custom, the pilot took on board with him the temperance pledge, and thus gave every sailor an opportunity to record his determination to become a temperance man, to the confusion of all grog-shop landlords and sharks. The pilot on boarding the Charles W. Morgan produced the teetotal pledge, and it was promptly signed by every person on board, from the Captain to the cabin-boy!

They are now commencing a new College on a magnificient scale,—eighty thousand dollars having already been contributed for the purpose, by nineteen individuals.

"CAST-IRON STEREOTYPE."—Experiments have for some years been in progress, chiefly under the superintendence of Herr Dase, inspector of mines at Richmond in the Duchy of Brunswick, with a view to make cast iron, as the cheaper and more durable material, applicable to the preparation of stereotype plates. The success of these experiments is attested by the publication of a cast-iron stereotype edition of the Bible, published at Nordhausen, the price of which, with marginal readings, is 9 ggr. or 26 cents.

At a sessions in Charleston, South Carolina, a few years ago, a man, for killing a negro, was fined two hundred and fifty dollars, while two other persons tried at the same sessions for negro-stealing were sentenced to be hanged.—Spirit of Liberty.

DIED,

At the residence of T. B. Stillman, in New York, on the 7th inst. of pulmonary phthisis, Mrs. MARIA S. WELLS, wife of Jason B. Wells, aged 24 years.

Mrs. Wells made a profession of faith in Christ at the early age of ten years, and during her subsequent life maintained a character in which the Christian graces were eminently combined. In her last illness, which was protracted and painful, she exhibited a cheerfulness and resignation which are pleasant to remember. The hour of her dissolution was welcome. As it approached, her spirit seemed to triumph over exhausted nature, and with many expressions of gratitude and affection, she commended those whom she had loved on earth to the care of Him who had been her portion. Then committing herself into the hands of a faithful Creator and gracious Redeemer, she fell asleep calmly and peacefully.

Her remains were taken to Plainfield, N. J., for interment, where a discourse was preached from a passage of Scripture which she had often repeated in her suffering, "The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?"

WINTER.

BY ELIZA COOK.

We know that it's good that old winter should come,
Roving awhile from his Lapland home;
'Tis fitting that we should hear the sound
Of his reindeer sledge on the slippery ground:

For his wide and glittering cloak of snow
Protects the seeds of life below;
Beneath his mantle are nurtured and born
The roots of the flowers, and the germs of the corn.

The whistling tone of his pure strong breath,
Rides purging the vapors of pestilent death.
I love him, I say, and avow it again,
For God's wisdom and might show well in his train.

But the naked—the poor! I know they quail,
With crouching limbs, from the biting gale;
They pine and starve by the fireless hearth,
And weep as they gaze on the frost-bound earth.

Stand nobly forth, ye rich of the land,
With kindly heart and bounteous hand,
Remember 'tis now their season of need,
And a prayer for help is a call ye must heed.

A few of thy blessings, a tithe of thy gold,
Will save the young, and cherish the old.
'Tis a glorious task to work such good—
Do it, ye great ones! ye can and ye should.

He is not worthy to hold from Heaven
The trust reposed, the talents given,
Who will not add to the portion that's scant.
In the pinching hours of cold and want.

O, listen in mercy! ye sons of wealth,
Basking in comfort and glowing with health;
Give whate'er you can spare, and be sure
He serveth his Maker who aideth the poor.

LOUIS PHILIPPE.

The New Orleans Picayune makes the following sensible remarks on the romantic fortunes of the King of the French.

There is no man, perhaps, now living, whose life has been so chequered as that of Louis Philippe, the present monarch of France. Reared in the lap of royalty, brought up amidst the luxuries of a princely court, he was, at an early age, in order to preserve his life, compelled to fly from both court and country, and under an assumed name to travel over most of the countries of Europe, often dependent on a peasant's hospitality for a portion of his rough fare, which the exiled prince found necessary to sustain nature. Nor was this all. He learned that the people over whom his relatives had ruled, had guillotined their king, and that the other members of his family, like himself, were wanderers in the world. To those who offered him succor in this his hour of need, it appears that he is not forgetful, as the following will show. It is copied into a London paper from a Swedish journal. "On the 3d inst., (July,) Vice Consul Burk, (rather a Milesian name for a Swede,) celebrated the eighty-second anniversary of his birthday. On the same day he received a letter from the King of the French, written with his own hand, and accompanied by a gold medal. The letter, which was dated from Neuilly, reads in these words:

"It is always agreeable to me to find that the traveler Muller, (the name under which the king traveled in Sweden to elude his pursuers,) has not been forgotten in a country which he visited in a simple guise, and unknown; and I always recall with pleasure this journey to my mind. Among my recollections, I give the first place to hospitality so frankly and cordially granted me, a stranger, throughout Norway, and particularly in Norland and Finmark; and at this moment, when the lapse of forty-nine years since I made this journey into Norway, has left me but few of my old hosts remaining, it is gratifying to me to be able to express to all, in your person, what grateful feelings I still entertain."

The travels of the exiled prince in this country are little less eventful than in Europe, save that he was not haunted with the fear of being captured and handed over to the merciless disposition of those who thirsted for his blood. Here, as there, he taught school for his support, and here, as there, the hand of hospitality was stretched out to him, aye, in this very city. Indeed, we learn that he still retains a lively recollection of the liberal courtesies extended to him, when he sojourned here, by our worthy fellow citizen, Bernard Marigny.

In Boston, too, Louis Philippe received some attention, and in Portsmouth, N. H., he was most agreeably entertained. He took a letter of introduction from Gov. Hancock to Jacob Sheaf, Esq., a wealthy and hospitable merchant of that place, and was cordially received and kindly treated by him. He was also entertained by Gov. Langdon and other gentlemen of that town, which was then distinguished for its generous hospitalities.

The Picayune concludes its remarks with these sentiments:

"But how strange it is, after suffering all the privations he did, both in Europe and here—after having providentially escaped from a French privateer as he returned to Europe—after finding so many barriers between the throne of France and himself—first the Republic—next the empire—and next the elder branch of the Bourbons occupying it—that fate or fortune should so soon have battered them all down, and permitted him peaceably to ascend it and sit on it for a period of fifteen years in undisturbed peace and quiet. His indeed has been a romance of real life."

PRIDE AND POVERTY.

Some editor very truly remarks, that there are hundreds of families in this country that have no small income, and yet are poor—and will remain so for life, unless they turn over a new leaf, and live as they ought. The members of such families are proud and extravagant, and expend a large amount to keep up appearances, and continue in the ranks of fashion. We can point to many such people, who might now be in independent circumstances, were it not for their pride. The children in such families are furnished with every thing to gratify their folly, as if the outward appearance were a sure guarantee of their respectability and future success.

If there is any thing we despise, it is the union of pride and poverty—the keeping up of appearances to the sacrifice of comfort and health. The money that has been expended by such persons for the last two or three years, if taken proper care of, would now place them in comfortable circumstances, if not be sufficient to purchase dwellings to shelter them in the decline of life.

Friend, if you are poor, don't be proud. Never starve yourself to cover your back, and make a fine appearance. Your wise neighbors but laugh at your folly, while those you strive to imitate, look upon you with contempt. Don't labor to conceal your poverty. It is far preferable to wear a sixpenny calico to meeting, and have it paid for, with plenty to eat, than dash about in silks which have been credited to you, while you have scarcely a decent meal in your house. Pride will ruin you sooner or later, so be wise, and divest yourself of folly, and dress according to your means. No one whose opinion is worth a straw—for your plain dress and hard hands, which tell plainly that honest labor is no stranger to you—will think the less of you; indeed, such appearance, if tidy, in nine cases out of ten, is the best recommendation.

AN OLD NEWSPAPER.

There is nothing more beneficial to the reflecting mind than the perusal of an old newspaper.—Though a silent preacher, it is one which conveys a moral more palpable and forcible than the most elaborate discourse. As the eye runs down its diminutive and old-fashioned columns, and peruses its quaint advertisements and by-gone paragraphs, the question forces itself on the mind—Where are now the busy multitude whose names appear on these pages; where is the puffing auctioneer, the pushing tradesman, and bustling merchant, the calculating lawyer, who each occupies a space in such chronicles of departed time? Alas, they have passed away like their forefathers, and are no more seen! From these considerations the mind naturally turns to the period when we, who now enjoy our span of existence in the chequered scene, shall have gone down into the dust, and shall furnish the same moral to our children that our fathers do to us? The sun will then shine as bright, the flowers will bloom as fair, the face of Nature will be as beautiful as ever—while we are reposing in our narrow cells, heedless of every thing that once charmed and delighted us.

ANNOYANCES OF LITERARY MEN.

When Montesquieu was deeply engaged in his great work, he writes to a friend:—"The favor which your friend Mr. Hein, often does me to pass his mornings with me, does great damage to my work, as well by his impure French as the length of his details." "We are afraid," said some of those visitors to Baxter, "that we break in upon your time." "To be sure you do," replied the disturbed and blunt scholar. To hint as gently as he could to his friends that he was avaricious of time, one of the learned Italians had a prominent inscription over the door of his study, intimating that whoever remained there must join in his labors. The amiable Melancthon, incapable of a harsh expression, when he received these idle visits, only noted down the time he had expended, that he might reanimate his industry, and not lose a day. Evelyn, continually importuned by morning visitors, or "taken up by other impertinences of my life in the country," stole his hours from his night rest, "to redeem the losses." The literary character has been driven to the most inventive shifts to escape the interruption of a formidable party at a single rush, who enter without "beseiging or beseeching," as Milton calls it. The late Ellis, a man of elegant taste and practical temperament, on one of these occasions at his country house, assured a literary friend that when driven to the last, he usually made his escape out of the window; and Boileau has noticed a similar dilemma when at the villa of the President Lamoigan, while they were holding their delightful conversations in his grounds. Brand Hollis endeavored to hold out "the idea of singularity as a shield;" and the great Robert Boyle was compelled to advertise in a newspaper that he must decline visits on certain days that he might have leisure to finish some of his works.

JANET FRAZER.

Who has not heard of Janet Frazer, the truly noble and devoted Scotch woman, who gave her homestead for the site of a Free Church, when no other situation in the whole neighborhood could be procured, in consequence of the land being held by a proud and irreligious Earl, who would for no pecuniary consideration furnish a site. Honorable mention was made by the Scotch delegation, when in this country, of her disinterestedness, and various little tokens of remembrance were sent to her by friends in America. We have the privilege of copying from a private letter from her to a friend in this country, what may be regarded as her answer to all those who thought her conduct was worthy of remembrance.

My heart was struck wi great surprise,
I scarcely could believe my eyes,
And ferlied* much that gifts sae bra,
Were sent me from America.

I bought mysel a braw new goon,
Its black merino, also shoon;
Part o' my gifts, thanks to them a',
My kind friends in America.

In gladness now I sit at hame,
Oft view my presents since they came,
Unmerited by me ava,
From my friends in America.

LOVE OF COUNTRY.

The Abbe de Lisle relates of an Indian, who, amidst the splendor of Paris, beholding a banana tree in the "Jardin des Plantes," bathed it with tears, and seemed for a moment to be transported to his own shore.

The Ethiopian imagines that God made his sands and deserts, while angels only were employed to make the rest of the world.

The Maltese, isolated on a rock, distinguish their lands by the appellation,

"The flowers of the world."

The Javanese, have such an affection for the place of their nativity, that no advantages can induce them, their agricultural tribes in particular, to quit the tomb of their fathers.

The Norwegians, proud of their barren summits, inscribe upon rix dollars: "Spirit, loyalty, valor, and whatever is honorable, let the world learn among the rocks of Norway."

UNBELIEVER'S CREED.

"I believe that there is no God, but that nature is God, and God is matter; and, that it is no matter whether there is any God or not.

I believe that the world was not made;—that the world made itself, and that it had no beginning; that it will last forever, world without end.

I believe that man is a beast; that the soul is the body, and the body the soul; and that after death there is neither body nor soul.

I believe that there is no religion; that natural religion is the only religion, and that all religion is natural.

I believe not in Moses. I believe in the First Philosophy. I believe not the Evangelists. I believe in Chubb, Collins, Toland, Tindal, Morgan, Mandeville, Hobbes, Shaftesbury. I believe in Lord Bolingbroke, Hume, Voltaire, Diderot, Baulenger, Volney, and Thomas Paine. I believe not St. Paul. I believe not revelation; I believe in tradition; I believe in the Talmud; I believe in the Koran; I believe not the Bible; I believe in Socrates; I believe in Confucius; I believe in Sanchoneathen; I believe in Mahomet; I believe not in Christ.

Lastly; I believe in all unbelief."

From the Cultivator for December.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

TRIPE.—Take the tripe as soon as practicable after it comes from the animal, rinse it well in cold water, and immediately sprinkle a thick coating of air-slacked lime over the inside—roll it up, and let it lie till the next day. Then cut it in pieces eight or ten inches square, scrape it and put in soak in salt and water, where it should remain seven or eight days, or till the strong smell is entirely gone, changing the salt and water every day. Then boil it tender. It may be soused like pig's feet, or it may be broiled, fried with sausages, or dipped in butter and fried alone.

SOUSE.—Take pig's feet, the head, &c., and after being well cleansed, boil them in water with a little salt, till the meat begins to drop off, then slip out the largest bones, and put the meet in a stone jar, or well-seasoned wood firkin. Make a liquor sufficient to cover them, as follows: Take one quart of the liquor they were boiled in, two quarts of vinegar, spiced with cloves, allspice, pepper, and cinnamon. While the meet is still warm, pour the liquor, boiling hot, upon it. In a few days it is fit for use, and may be either rolled in flour and fried in lard or sausage-fat, or warmed in a little of the liquor, or eaten cold.

The feet and shanks of cattle, cleansed in the same manner as pig's feet, are excellent. When sufficiently boiled, all the bones should be taken out, and the meat immediately chopped fine, and seasoned with salt, pepper, allspice, summer savory, and sage. When wanted for use, they may be warmed over in a little butter, and are nice, delicate eating—scarcely inferior to oysters, which they somewhat resemble. They make equally as good souse as pig's feet. The jelly which is left after they are boiled, makes excellent blanc mange. All these articles are frequently thrown away in families. With a little labor, they constitute the most favorite dishes—fit for a king or even a farmer.

A HOUSE KEEPER.

SALT FOR FRUIT TREES.—A writer in the Boston Cultivator says a pear tree was killed by a quantity of salt having been left in an old flour barrel near the body of the tree. A heavy rain dissolved the salt and forced it into the ground among the roots. The tree soon exhibited signs of blast or decay, and on cutting off and examining the branches, he "found the leaves not only highly impregnated, but encrusted with a visible saline matter." During the summer, the tree died. Too much salt was undoubtedly the cause of the trouble. A small quantity has been recommended to be put round the trees for the destruction of insects. The editor of the Boston Cultivator says two quarts is enough for a tree of "middling size."

OLD HUNDRED.—The music in harmony of four parts of this venerable and deservedly popular church tune, was composed by Claude Goudimel, about the year 1544. The composer, who was chapel master at Lyons, France, died in 1572, a victim to religious opinion. The harmony of his hymn has since been altered, (not for the better,) as may be seen by comparing the same as arranged in the present collection of church music with the original. It is a popular musico-historical error, that Martin Luther was the composer of this noble choral.

BATHING.—A French physcian visited Damascus with a view to settle. Seeing the luxuriant vegetation around it, he exclaimed, "Ah, this is the place for me—plenty of fever." Entering the city and noticing the abundance water, he said, "More fever—no place like Damascus." "But what building is that?" he asked. "A bath." "And what is that?" "A bath." "And that other building?" "A bath." "Curse on the baths!" said the doctor, "They will take the bread out of my mouth, I must seek fever and practice elsewhere." So he turned back and hied him elsewhere.

LEGAL ABSURDITIES.—Major Noah thus shows up, the absurdity of some of our legal technicalities:

"Why cannot we simplify the language of the law—why not banish its old black letter Vandalism? 'Sir, I give you this Orange,' and I do give it—should not that declaration and transfer be deemed an absolute conveyance? Yet to make it perfectly legal it must run thus:

'I give you all and singular my estate and interests, right, title and claim, and advantage of and in that orange, with the rind, skin, juice, pulp, and pips, and all rights and advantages therein, with full power to bite, cut, suck, or otherwise eat the same, or give the same away.'"

The distillery of the Messrs. Smith, which paid the English government annually for excise, £400,000 sterling, has been seized. It was ascertained that an enormous vat was filled with spirits not duly reported. The excise officers called and desired to see the vat. Mr. Smith pretended to ring for a servant, but the counterfeit bell-rope opened a valve, which discharged the vat into the Thames. For the time the officers were foiled, but the trick was discovered, when the premises were seized.

It is related of the celebrated John Howe, chaplain to Oliver Cromwell, that being often applied to for protection by men of all parties, in those eventful times, he never refused assistance to any worthy person, whatever his religious views; until one day Cromwell said to him, "Mr. Howe, you have asked favors for every body except yourself; pray when does your turn come?" "My turn, my Lord Protector," said Howe, "is always come when I can serve another."

ODD FELLOWS.—The Symbol, or Odd Fellows Magazine, contains a table prepared to show the progressive increase of the Order of Odd Fellows in this country, from 1840 to 1844, inclusive. There were in

A NEW COMMENTARY.—The first commentary upon the New Testament by a Universalist, has lately been issued by Lucius R. Page.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location, thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

President of the Board of Trustees

CONNECTION OF THE DAY WITH THE INSTITUTION.

"The fourth commandment is so worded as to admit of the change of the day of rest, without at all violating the institution. And this the divine lawgiver doubtless so arranged, with a view to the alteration which the gospel would introduce. The Jew could never have determined from this command on what day his first Sabbath was to be kept. It enjoins no more than that the interval of time between rest and rest should be six days. The proportion of days is the essential point. The Christian Sabbath, in the sense of the fourth commandment, is as much the seventh day, as the Jewish Sabbath was the seventh day."

The foregoing paragraph is extracted from Bishop Wilson's "Sermons on the Divine Authority and Perpetual Obligation of the Lord's Day." For an exposure of the utter fallacy of the sentiment which it contains, we refer our readers to our remarks week before last upon the True Issue. The more we think of it, the more glaring does its fallacy appear; so that we should wonder at its being entertained by any person of judgment, were it not for the number of respectable names that have endorsed it. At some future time we may, perhaps, expose more fully the impossibility of such being the meaning of the law of the Sabbath. Our object in citing the paragraph now, is to make some remarks upon what is generally considered to be the principal end and design of the sabbatic institution.

It is generally considered, that one great end of the institution is to secure rest to the body, that the physical energies of man and beast may be recruited. It is found by close observation, that the human frame wears out under uninterrupted labor; and that the poor beast, if doomed to perpetual toil, sinks under the premature exhaustion of his powers. Both man and beast will perform more work, and perform it in a better manner, if they rest one day in seven, than if they labor during the whole hebdomadal period. It is also at least highly probable, if not a well established fact, that uninterrupted mental labor has a tendency to bring on insanity. The student needs the weekly repose, as well as the laboring man. Hence it is contended, that the sabbatic institution is founded in our very nature; and that no law of God better illustrates his great benevolence, than does that, which, as our Saviour teaches, "was made for man." These are our views, as well as those of multitudes of others who have considered the subject.

But bodily rest is not the only end of the sabbatic institution. If it were, we see not but one day would answer the purpose just as well as another. Sunday might just as well be observed as Saturday, and we should have no great reason for differing from the view expressed by Bishop Wilson in the paragraph we have quoted. But the spiritual welfare of men is an end of the Sabbath, just as much as their bodily comfort.

But cannot the spiritual welfare of men be promoted on the first day of the week as well as on the seventh? Although the answer to this question may seem very simple, so simple that none can hesitate to give it in the affirmative, we apprehend there is room for doubt. If the spiritual welfare of men can be promoted under a system of religion multilated of some of its brightest features, then it may be promoted by the observance of one day just as well as of another. All that is necessary is, for men to separate themselves to the religious contemplation of what in stereotyped phrase are called the "fundamentals of the gospel;" and working these over in their minds from week to week, they attain the end which they propose to themselves. We shall not undertake to deny, that such a course will conduce to their spiritual welfare to some extent, and indeed to a very great extent. On the contrary, we firmly believe it will, and that it has done so heretofore. It is on this principle, that the regular separation of Christians from worldly employments on the Sunday, and their attending to religious duties, have been so beneficial.

But if, in order to the spiritual welfare of men, it is necessary that they embrace in their studies and profound meditations the whole system which God has revealed in the Bible, and just as he has revealed it; if the whole unmutilated and unbroken system ought to be brought to bear upon their minds, in order that they may receive its moulding influence; and if they cannot attain to "the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" without this;—then we must say, that the mere observance of one day in every seven, or the observance of any other day than the seventh day of the week, will not answer the purpose. In order that our doctrine may be perfectly obvious to the understanding of every one, we submit the following proposition:—

That those who discard the Sabbath from their creed, blot out the only visible token of the truth of Natural Religion—the only monument which God has set up to attest that He is the Creator, Beautifier, and Perfecter, of all things; and that those who plead a transfer of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week, are as guilty, in this particular, as those who discard it altogether.

In establishing this proposition, it is necessary to observe, that in the Bible three great and prominent systems are brought to view, viz: Natural Religion, Judaism, and Christianity. Each of these systems is founded on a certain relation which God sustains to men.

Natural Religion is founded on the relation which God sustains to the whole race of mankind as their Creator. The duties, or laws, which grow out of this relation, constitute what is commonly called the Moral Law.

Judaism is founded on a special relation which God entered into with the posterity of Abraham, whereby they were constituted a nation of priests, for the purpose of serving Him according to the Levitical law. Heb. 7: 11; Ex. 19: 5, 6. The laws and institutions growing out of this relation, are sometimes called the Ceremonial Law.

Christianity is founded on that peculiar relation which God enters into with believers of all nations, whereby he engages to become their Redeemer through Jesus Christ. The whole system of duties, blessings, and privileges, growing out of this relation, and dispensed according to the New Covenant, is commonly called the Gospel.

Judaism and Christianity are but the two parts of a great scheme for the Redemption of mankind. The former prepared the way for the latter; and when the latter came, the former, having answered the end for which it was instituted, was of course abolished. Judaism was developed and dispensed as a system before Christ came in the flesh, and is therefore found in that division of Scripture commonly called the Old Testament. Christianity received its full development, and, as a system, was dispensed after the coming of Christ, and is therefore found in the New Testament. But Natural Religion pervades the whole Bible. Being the system, for a violation of which men are counted sinners, it is both fit and necessary that it should pervade both parts of the great scheme for their redemption. For the great object of redemtion is to bring men back to a conformity to that law which by sin they have violated.

Now to each of these systems belong certain commemorative institutions—ordinances which are monumental attestations of some great fact, or facts, upon which are predicated the systems of religion to which they respectively pertain. Thus Christianity has its Baptism and Supper. The one commemorates the death of Christ, whenever it is celebrated. "As often as ye eat of this bread and drink this cup, ye do show forth the Lord's death till he come." 1 Cor. 11: 26. The other commemorates the burial and resurrection of the Saviour; for as the believer is submerged under the water, and rises again, he attests his belief that his master was buried and rose again. Rom. 6: 3—5. The ordinance is also prospective; for the subject of it looks forward to his own resurrection, in which he firmly believes. 1 Cor. 15: 29. These ordinances having been always administered in the church of God, are monuments of the truth of the Gospel which enjoins them, inasmuch as they point directly to the great facts upon which Christianity is predicated—the death and resurrection of Jesus, its Founder.

Judaism also has its commemorative institutions. Out of the many of them we may instance the Passover. This ordinance commemorates the great fact that God spared the Israelites when he destroyed the Egyptians, and brought them out from bondage by a mighty hand, for the purpose of constituting them into a nation of priests, to serve Him in the land of Canaan. It was also prospective, looking forward to Christ, the Passover sacrificed for us. 1 Cor. 5: 7.

Have both Christianity and Judaism their commemorative institutions, rising up as monuments, upon which are inscribed certain great events, and serving to attest the truth of the respective systems to which they belong; and has Natural Religion none? Yet it has NONE, if the Sabbath is blotted out; in which case, God is represented as being more careful to preserve the monumental evidences of the truth of the Gospel, than of that system which makes men need the gospel!

We have said that Natural Religion is founded on the Relation which God sustains to the universe as Creator. The Sabbath is the only institution which commemorates the work of creation. It is the only monument, upon which is inscribed the great fact, that God made the world in six days, and rested on the seventh; the only memorial, therefore, of that relation upon which the whole Moral Law is founded. By the observance of it we profess our faith, that the worlds were framed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things that do appear. Heb. 11: 3. We acknowledge the great Jehovah above all the false, idol gods of the heathen; that His hand alone made all, and that he divided not his glory with another. We declare our conviction that the world sprang not into existence by chance, but that it must have had a Former. Thus the Sabbath is a standing testimony against Atheism and Idolatry; the only ordinance which answers this character. Shall it then be blotted out from our creed? Shall it have no place in our religious system! Is it not monstrous to harbor such a thought of Jesus Christ, as that he deliberately went to work to break down, and raze to its foundations, this glorious monument of creative power! Went to work to destroy the evidence of the truth of that system, without which Redemption itself is mere farce! O Christian, beware what you do! To argue, as some of you do, that the Redeemer was a breaker of the Sabbath while on earth, that he aimed at setting it aside altogether, and afterwards gradually accomplished it by the promulgation of his religion in the earth; is to argue virtually that Christianity began in an alliance with Athiesm itself! O that such monstrous sentiments might cease and never again come from the lips of Christians.

The first part of our proposition is proved. We proceed to establish the remaining part of it, that those who plead a transfer of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week, are no less guilty of blotting out the ordinance which exhibits God as the Creator and Finisher of all things, than those who discard the Sabbath altogether.

We might safely rest the proof of this position upon what we offered under "The true Issue." We there showed, that the day and the institution were not separable, as some suppose;—that the duty enjoined by the law of the Sabbath, grew out of what God had done with regard to a particular day;—that the Rest which was enjoined, was preeminently and specifically the rest which God himself had observed, in its weekly return;—that that rest, and no other, was determined by the law itself to be the Sabbath. Of course it follows, that those who do not observe the seventh day, do not observe the Sabbath, though they may observe a Sabbath. To our mind, this argument is sound. But for the sake of those whose views have always been moulded in another creed, we offer something more.

Those who contend for a change of the Sabbath, always do so on the ground of the work of Redemption being greater than that of Creation. Of course, in their view, the Sabbath now is no longer a memorial of Creation, but of Redemption. According to their own principles, therefore, the memorial of creation is blotted out, being superseded by that which is supposed to be a memorial of what is far greater. What else then do we want than their own admission?

The more considerate part of our first day brethren, apparently startled at their own admissions, endeavor to put in a salvo, by maintaining that the first day of the week was "emphatically the creation day, the day in which God created all the substance of universal nature out of nothing." That although God was pleased to spend six days in assimilating, assorting and arranging the materials, out of which he built up not only the earth, but the whole heavenly fabric, "nevertheless no additional substance was produced out of nothing." (See Parkinson's Letters to Maxson.)*

We grant that the first day of the week might answer to commemorate the simple fact, that God created something out of nothing. It might answer to commemorate chaos, that mass of confusion and emptiness, which was not yet formed and adapted to any useful purpose. It might even serve to commemorate the production of light. But is this all of the great work of God, which our brethren think it important to celebrate? Are they satisfied that their institution should attest simply, that Jehovah is the Beginner of creation? Do they not know that he is the Finisher also? How sorrily does their institution bear witness against Atheism and Idolatory! How incomplete, how imperfect, how mutilated its testimony! A consideration, which is in itself internal evidence that Jesus Christ never appointed it. No, never. The Saviour could not have so mutilated an institution of heaven, as to make it henceforth declare, that God "began to build and was not able to finish."

Now let it be particularly observed, that the Sabbath is a memorial of God's having FINISHED his works, as well as of his having created the materials out of nothing. Heb. 4: 3, 4. It was not till God had CEASED from his works that he rested. (ver. 10.) It was after he had perfected and beautified every thing, and seen that all was "very good," that the Sabbath was appointed to commemorate all this glory. Hence, in the fourth commandment, when the reason on which the institution is founded is stated, it is—not, for God CREATED the world—but, "for in six days the Lord MADE the heaven," &c. Wherefore the salvo, that on the first day of the week chaotic matter was produced, making it "emphatically the creation-day," entirely fails to meet the difficulty.

Again, it must be remembered, that the institution commemorates not only the work of God, as displayed in forming the world, but also the rest which God observed afterwards. Now, as this rest occurred on the seventh day of the week, it can with no propriety be commemorated on any other day. As well might the people of the United States undertake to commemorate the Declaration of Independence in the middle of winter, as for Christians to celebrate the rest of the Lord their God on the first day of the week.

Here it is in point to ask our brethren, why they keep the first day of the week? They will answer, that they do so, because they suppose the work of redemption to have been finished on that day, and they wish to commemorate that matter. They do it, because in their opinion any other day would be unsuitable for such celebration. Well, we have often heard that "it is a poor rule that will not work both ways." If any other day would be unsuitable for commemorating the finishing of redemption, than the one on which it actually was finished, then by the same rule, any other day than the seventh day of the week would be unsuitable for celebrating the finishing of creation. So that, reasoning from principles which they themselves acknowledge, the transfer of the Sabbath from the original day virtually destroys the institution. How, therefore, the first day of the week can be called the Sabbath of the fourth commandment, or identical with it, is utterly beyond our comprehension.

From all that has been offered it follows, that even if we should admit that Christ enjoined upon his disciples to rest from labor the first day of the week, constituting it strictly a Sabbath, it is not the same institution as that which was appointed from the beginning. It is a memorial of a very different thing. Many first day people are wise enough to see this, and hence do not pretend that they keep the sabbath. These, however, in common with all the rest, have no memorial which attests, in opposition to Atheism and Idolatry, that Jehovah, the one true God, is the Creator and Finisher of all things.

We appeal to the candid reader, if our proposition is not fairly established. Those who contend for a change of the day of the Sabbath, as well as those who discard it entirely, in their overwrought zeal to magnify the work of Redemption, have destroyed the only visible token of the truth of Natural Religion. They have broken down the monument, upon which was inscribed the great fact, that God made the world in six days; or, to say the very least, they have so mutilated the original inscription, that it is virtually destroyed; that which remains of it reflecting dishonor, rather than honor, upon the Almighty, by declaring him to be but the Beginner—not the Finisher—of all things. And all this is attempted to be fathered upon Jesus Christ and his inspired apostles.

We are now prepared to answer the question, whether the spiritual welfare of men can be promoted on the first day of the week, as well as on the seventh. The result of our investigation appears to be this. The spiritual welfare of souls is promoted by bringing the system of religion as revealed in the Bible to bear upon them; the word of truth being the mould by which their character is formed. If this system of religion is entirely independent of the day we keep; if the true doctrine of the Sabbath makes no part of it;—then our souls' welfare may be promoted on any day that we may choose to set apart for the purpose. But if the Sabbath, and the true doctrine of the Sabbath, are a necessary part of this religious system, combined with it for the very purpose of giving that mould to our character, which is according to godliness; then it follows, that the abstraction of this doctrine destroys the moulding power of the system, by just so much as the doctrine makes a part of it. Hence we are driven to the conclusion, that the observance of the first day of the week is not so conducive to the soul's interests, as the observance of the Sabbath.

From all that we have offered it appears, that the true end of the sabbatic institution is the display of God's glory. It is more than merely founded in our nature. Like every thing else of divine appointment, God himself is the last end of it. The true doctrine of it illustrates God's glory; it sheds light upon the nature of his moral government; it helps to place Natural Religion in a distinct point of view, and shows the relation it has to the great work of Redemption; it enables us to behold the Bible as a complete, unmutilated, and all-perfect system, bearing witness against Atheism and Idolatry, as well as against man's self-sufficiency. In view of all this blazing glory of the divine word, we feel more than ever the truth of that Scripture, "the law of the Lord is PERFECT, converting the soul."

The true end of the Sabbath being to display God's glory, as well as to promote the good of the creature, and this being intimately connected with and inseparable from the form in which the institution was originally given, it follows, that Bishop Wilson's idea—which is the idea of many others—is not correct. On the contrary, the fourth commandment is not so worded as to admit of a change of the day of rest, without violating the institution.

---

* It is due to candor to say, that Mr. P. does not plead for a transfer of the Sabbath. He contends that the Lord's Day stands entirely on New Testament ground, and altogether independent of the fourth commandment. He is therefore to be classed with those who discard the Sabbath entirely; notwithstanding he supposes a great analogy in many respects between the Sabbath and "Lord's Day." What he has stated, however, in regard to the first day being "emphatically the creation-day," is in perfect keeping with the notions of all who observe that day.

WAR.

"Now look aside," says Jerrold, "and contemplate God's image with a musket! What a fine looking thing is war! Yes, dress it as you may, dress and feather it, daub it with gold, huzza it, and sing swaggering songs about it,—what is it, nine times out of ten, but murder in uniform? Cain taking the sergeant's shilling? Yet, O man of war! at this very moment, you are shrinking, withering, like an aged giant. The fingers of Opinion have been busy at your plumes,—you are not the feathered thing you were; and then this little tube, the goose quill, has sent its silent shots into your huge anatomy; and the corroding INK, even while you look at it and think it shines so brightly, is eating, with a tooth of iron, into your sword."

BEAUTIFUL ANECDOTE.

A happy illustration of the wonderful character of the Bible, and the facility with which even a child may answer, by it, the greatest of questions, and solve the sublimest of mysteries, was perhaps never given than at an examination of a deaf and dumb institution, some years ago in London.

A little boy was asked in writing, "Who made the world?"

He took the chalk and wrote underneath the question,

"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth."

The clergyman then inquired in a similar manner, "Why did Jesus Christ come into the world?"

A smile of delight and gratitude rested on the countenance of the little fellow as he wrote,

"This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners."

A third was proposed, evidently adapted to call his most powerful feelings into exercise.

"Why were you born deaf and dumb, when I can hear and speak?"

"Never," said an eye witness, "shall I forget the look of resignation which sat upon his countenance, as he took the chalk and wrote,

"Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight."

THE INFIDEL IN A GALE.

During the late gale on Lake Erie, the steamer Robert Fulton, among many other vessels, was wrecked.

"On board that boat, as was related by a passenger, and published in the Religious Herald, was an Infidel, with a box of books to distribute at the west. He was loud and clamorous in proclaiming his infidelity, till the gale came on—but then, like the rest, he was silent, and waited with trembling anxiety the uncertain fate of the ship. At length they drew near the shore, and attempted to throw out their anchors, when the whole forward part of the ship broke off, and the waves rushed into the cabin. At once the infidel was on his knees crying for mercy—his voice could be heard above the raging elements, begging the Lord to forgive his blasphemy, till a heavy sea swept over the deck, and carried him and his books to the bottom."

FORCE OF TRUTH.

Two Brahmins have been baptized, and received into the church at Calcutta. One of these was of the highest caste, and most respectable family connections, besides being possessed of great wealth. He sacrifices all his property, amounting to $100,000, and becomes an outcast—his family, disowning him and his countrymen abhorring him. Literally, he denies himself, takes up his cross and follows Christ—forsaking houses and lands, father and mother, brother and sister, wife and children. Such is the power of the Gospel in all lands, when it takes hold on the heart, and makes man a new creature. Apply this standard to the vast number of professing Christians among ourselves, who contribute nothing and less than nothing to the fulfillment of the great command, "Go preach the Gospel to every creature," and where are they found? It is a fearful thing to enter the church of Christ without the spirit of entire self consecration to his service. But that thousands on thousands do enter it, admits not of a doubt, if we judge the tree by its fruits.

IRREVERENCE OF HEARERS.—The visitors, I will not say worshipers, in some of the churches, the moment they are seated, begin to gaze around, or to whisper, and while the benediction is pronounced they are seizing their hats, canes, parasols or umbrellas, to make a precipitate retreat. This irreverence is said to be peculiar to this country. In England, in dissenting chapels, as well as in the churches of the establishment, the congregation bow their heads while the benediction is pronounced, and with the minister, continue bowed a few moments after it is finished, and even, in this country, do not put their hats on, until they reach the vestibule. Our fore-fathers were accustomed to this in the old country. How is it that their posterity have forgotten it?

CHRISTIAN COURAGE.—When Valens, the emperor, sent messengers to win Eusebius to heresy, by fair words and large promises, he answered, "Alas, sir! these speeches are fit to catch little children." When the emperor threatened to confiscate his goods, to torment, to banish, or to kill him, he answered, "He needs not fear confiscation who has nothing to lose; nor banishment to whom heaven alone is his country; nor torments, when his body will be destroyed at one blow; nor death, which is the only way to set him at liberty from sin and sorrow."

PULPIT ADVERTISEMENTS.—Every one has read the story of the orthodox deacon, who said at the close of a warm exhortation, that he was as sure that there was a God, as he was that there was flour in Alexandria; and he knew that for certain, because he had just received a fresh lot which he would sell as cheap for cash as any other store in the place!

DISCUSSION.

Many persons claim great credit for refusing to discuss questions of difference between themselves and others. And in connection with setting up this claim for themselves, they not unfrequently denounce all those who pursue a different course as quarrelsome and unchristian. This is an easy way, surely, to dispose of a difficulty, and get a reputation for peaceableness and piety. But is it manly or Christian? We think not. It takes for granted, in the first place, that those who differ from us are not only in error, but are unwilling to know the truth; for if such was not the case, a free and candid discussion, instead of widening the breach, would be a means of eliciting truth and drawing the disputants nearer together. In the second place, it takes for granted, that those who are disposed to discuss a matter with us, wish to do so mainly for the purpose of gaining the mastery and putting us to shame. To cherish habitually this feeling toward those who differ from us, but who yet give evidence of honesty and piety, is directly at war with true manliness and Christian charity.

In every case where there exists a difference of opinion, there is a right and a wrong. It is true, that of any two individuals who discuss the difference, one may be right and the other wrong, or they may be both wrong. But in what way is the case so likely to be determined, and the difference harmonized, as by an honest and prayerful discussion of it? If this discussion be entered upon sincerely, and with a desire to know the truth, we cannot conceive of its failing to produce such results. It may not be produced during the heat of debate; or, if produced, it may not be acknowledged; yet we have too high an opinion of human nature and Christian candor to believe that its effect will be wholly lost. Subsequent reflection and comparison, in the light of what has been said in discussion, will often greatly modify, if it does not entirely change, the opinion of an opponent.

To understand the true mode of conducting discussions is all-important. When it is entered upon with heated, envious, or bitter feelings, little good can be expected. It must be done coolly, and with such a sense of the importance of the subject as shall raise the parties quite above personal considerations. They must feel a wound inflicted upon the truth more than a wound inflicted upon themselves, and a triumph of truth must be prized above their triumph as debaters. Failure here has often cut short discussion before the truth was reached; or, if the discussion was continued, has caused it to end in alienation of feelings, and a still wider separation. Candor must be added to coolness. It requires the rarest qualities in a disputant to give the arguments of an opponent their full weight, and to claim no more than their proper weight for his own. Yet this may be done, and it will be found in the end to be the most effectual means of carrying a point—though it ought not to be done for that purpose alone. Candor in discussion is noble, and exalts both the parties concerned and the truth; but a disposition to cheat, to misrepresent, or to take advantage of an unguarded word, degrades the parties, and turns discussion into mere wrangling. Where coolness and candor are combined, discussion will seldom run from one question to another, and be prolonged by the introduction of irrelevant matter. It will present all the arguments which can be found in their proper places, and leave them to produce their natural and appropriate results. When these are exhausted, the discussion will cease, and the mind be allowed to make up its own verdict.

Now we are certain, that such discussion as has here been described, is both praise-worthy and useful. It serves to remove the false impressions engendered by difference of opinion, and to elicit truth upon the subjects under consideration. It often strengthens friendships which exist, and makes friends of those who had been separated by their differences of opinion. That is a false and vulgar notion, that an opponent in a discussion is necessarily an enemy; it can exist only in narrow and superficial minds, and ought never to be encouraged for a moment. A truly noble mind will respect an opponent who advances his own views with candor and earnestness. Though a long discussion may not bring the disputants to see eye to eye, yet it will assimilate them to each other. And when such discussion is brought to a close, it will be with hearty good will and conscious benefit.

LEADERS IN BENEVOLENT ENTERPRISES.

The difficulty of securing among Christian churches adequate and systematic contributions to benevolent objects, is well known. We are inclined to believe, however, that this difficulty results more from a want of orderly and approved means to raise such contributions, than from a want of interest in the objects. It is an old maxim, that what is everybody's business is nobody's business. Hence it has happened, that in many churches where no individual has felt especially called upon to take the lead, the whole subject has been neglected and forgotten. But whose business is it to take the lead? To this question we think there can be but one reply. The Minister occupies a position in the church which makes him to a certain extent responsible to take the lead and see that the work is done. He is the watchman, and may therefore be expected to look over the field and know what is needed. He is the teacher of the people, and ought therefore to instruct them in their whole duty. He is an example to the flock, and should therefore go forward in the pursuit of those objects which the flock ought to pursue. His relations to the people, in every respect, are such as to point him out for the leader, and throw upon him weighty responsibility—responsibility which can only be met by great diligence and faithfulness. But aside from the obligation growing out of his relation to the church, it is quite certain that his influence as a preacher would be greatly promoted by taking an active part in these movements. All preaching should lead to action in some form or another; and if the preacher himself carries his precepts into practice by taking hold of benevolent labors, there will be few unwilling to second his efforts. Facts show that in those churches which have done most to promote benevolent objects, other interests have most prospered. On the other hand, where these objects have been entirely overlooked, the attention which they should have received has been given to unworthy objects, and often to such as lead to discord and strife. It is the duty and interest of the minister of the gospel, to give to benevolent enterprises his active co-operation. If he were to do so in earnest, many expensive agencies would be superseded, and the work would be effectually done. Yet the responsibility is not wholly removed from other members of the church by the minister's neglect. They may act if he does not; and happy is that church which has in it those who feel their individual responsibility and act accordingly.

REVIVALS.

We are glad to find, in looking over our exchanges, frequent notices of revivals of religion. To one church in Pennsylvania 40 persons were recently added by baptism, to another 84, and to several others smaller numbers. In New Hampshire, New York, Rhode Island, and some other sections of the country, similar facts are mentioned.

These pleasing indications that God is yet gracious to his people are full of encouragement. But they should not be allowed to foster an impression that religion can only be advanced by the instrumentality of extraordinary measures and boisterous excitements. There is scarcely room to doubt that too much account has heretofore been made of such measures, and too little of the ordinary ministrations of the Word in connection with faithful pastoral counsel. Indeed, it is highly probable, that the remarkable declension which has been witnessed for a time past, is attributable to this more than to any other single cause. After the admonition which has been given, there ought to be great caution and care upon this point. Let a revival commence in the hearts of God's people, and be followed up by the regular and faithful preaching of the Gospel, and the most happy results may be expected. The Word of God will not return unto him void.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

The Missionary Herald for January contains a summary of the present operations of the American Board of Commisioners for Foreign Missions. The following statement presents most of the facts, and will be read with interest:—

The number of missions under the direction of the Board, is twenty-five; connected with which are ninety-four stations. At these stations are laboring 133 ordained missionaries, 8 of whom are physicians, besides 7 physicians who are not preachers; also, 16 teachers, 9 printers and bookbinders, five other lay brethren, and 178 married and unmarried females—in all, 348 laborers sent from this country. Connected with these are 17 native preachers, and 122 other native helpers—making the whole number in foreign lands connected with the Board and sustained from its treasury, 487. The number of persons connected by church membership with these missions is 25,612. The number of printing establishments is fifteen—comprising 6 type foundries, 30 presses, 32 founts of type, with preparation for printing in 32 different languages. The printing executed for the missions during the year has amounted to 46,796,016 pages. The whole number of pages printed for the missions of the Board since its commencement has been about 488,000,000 in 38 different languages. The average annual expenditure of the Board, for the last half a dozen years, has been about $250,000.

In connection with these missions there are 6 Seminaries, designed principally for training native teachers and preachers, in which are 383 pupils; and other boarding schools, containing 1,029 pupils; making the number of boarding pupils under special Christian instruction 1,412; also 639 free schools, in which are more than 30,000 pupils; making the whole number in a course of education about 32,000. These missions, since their commencement about 30 years ago, have been instrumental in teaching upward of 75,000 persons, children and adults, to read the Scriptures in their own language, who probably would not otherwise have become acquainted with the sacred truths of Revelation.

Baptists in New Jersey.—There are in the State of New Jersey, 80 Baptist churches, embracing 11,614 members, 90 pastors, and 106 preachers. The number of additions by baptism during the last conventional year was 496. There are 6 county towns, and 160 towns and villages, in which no Baptist church is located. The State is divided into four Associations, besides which, several churches are connected with Associations in New York. The total sum contributed for benevolent operations during the year was $3,839 66—being an average of about 33 cents from each member.

London Religious Tract Society.—This Society was formed in 1799, through the agency of such men as George Burder, Samuel Greatheed, and Rowland Hill. It was designed to furnish cheap religious publications, none of which should have a sectarian character, and each one of which should make known the way of a sinner's salvation by Christ. In the first year of the institution's existence, it received $2,000, and issued 200,000 tracts; in the last year it received $250,000, and issued 15,600,000 books and tracts. It has recently erected a spacious building for the transaction of its business, at a cost of about $75,000, no part of which was derived from contributions for gratuitous operations.

THE JEWS.

Among the encouraging signs of the present time, we place the growing interest of evangelical Christians in the religious condition and prospects of the Jews. This interest is apparent in nearly every department of the Christian church, and is an omen of good. By a large class of persons, the conversion of the Jews is beginning to be regarded as inseparably connected with the latter-day glory and the ingathering of the fulness of the Gentiles. As they see what they regard as indications that this period is approaching, they appear to take fresh courage and strength. Yet we confidently believe, that before any general movement among that people will be witnessed, Christians must themselves agree upon some points at issue between them and the Jews. They must give up some practices not sanctioned by the Scriptures, and adopt some things now neglected which are required by them. The growing interest in their condition will tend to bring up the subject.

The Episcopal Recorder publishes the following facts, which are regarded as corroborating the assertion of Prof. Tholuck, that more genuine voluntary conversions have taken place within twenty-five years than in the seventeen hundred since the days of Paul:—

"In Berlin, in a population of 7000 Jews, are reckoned one thousand who have embraced the faith of Jesus Christ. One minister, the Rev. Mr Kuntze, has baptized 150 in twelve years. Nearly 1,900 Jews have received baptism in Russia in the space of fifteen years. The missionary, Rev. Mr. Hiswek, who is in Poland, wrote lately that many of the Jews of Gallici are ready to embrace Christianity; but they are prevented by the Austrian government, which will not allow them to make a Christian profession, unless they will become Romanists; this they will not do, for they entertain towards popery, the deepest aversion. They come from all parts to seek Bibles from the missionaries. In Hungary, are hundreds of villages where half the Jewish population would ask for baptism if the Protestant pastors could preach to them regularly.

"Some of these proselytes are men of talent and learning. In England, eight of them are devoted to the sacred ministry, and do honor to their vocation by their capacity as well as their piety. At Breslau, it is remarkable that converted Jews occupy in the university the three chairs of philosophy, philology and chemistry. At Halle, what is more remarkable, there are not less than five professors who are proselytes from Judaism. The whole Christian world must know the most celebrated of these converted Germans, Doctor Augustus Neander, Professor of Ecclesiastical History in Berlin, and one of the most learned men who have ever appeared. Lastly, in Holland, Dr. Capadoce, and the poet Da Costa, distinguished both by their talents and standing in society, also belong to Judaism."

THE MENDI MISSION.

It will be remembered that when the Mendians of the ship Amistad returned to Africa, they were accompanied by missionaries from this country. The missionaries located themslves in West Africa, about 100 miles from Sierra Leone, and 30 miles from the coast, where they have built houses and made considerable improvements. The territory is held by an old chief named Tucker, who was formerly an extensive slave-dealer. He says he is afraid of nothing but Almighty God; and he is somewhat troubled about his former course, since he has been taught that God can not sanction trafficking in men made in his own image. But the trade continues, and slaves are sold for rum, tobacco, cloth, &c., six slaves being often given for a puncheon of rum. In addition to the good which the mission is doing among the natives, it is throwing much light upon the customs of that country—especially those customs which are connected with slave-trading.

A Noble Example.—There is a church in Rhode Island, embracing only 82 members, of whom more than 30 are engaged as tract visitors among 600 families covering a territory of about six square miles. During the year past, 3,045 copies of the Tract Society's Paper, and 100,816 pages of Tracts, have been distributed. This important result is attributed to the fidelity of the pastor, and is a happy illustration of what can be done by a few individuals with faithfulness and system.

Complimentary, very.—The Methodist Conference of South Carolina convened on the 25th ult., at Columbia, and continued its sessions for about a week. The following complimentary account of its action relative to the division of the Church, appears in the Charleston Courier:—

The action of the Southern Delegates to the General Conference, on the case of Bishop Andrew, and the division of the Church, was unanimously approved; a division was considered inevitable, so that it was unanimously resolved not to concur in the proposal of the Holston Annual Conference, to meet in Louisville in May next, to devise some plan of compromise between the Conference of the slave-holding and non-slave-holding States. This was eminently wise and judicious, and still further commends the Church to the confidence of our people, since it is plain no compromise whatever can be made by the South between Slavery and Abolition, none but what must inevitably look to the overthrow of the former, and increase the imminent danger of the South. May the blessing of God ever rest on the men and their counsels, who are thus unwaveringly true alike to Him and their country!—and we feel assured it will do so.

Bishop Soule, while on his journey to Columbia, came very near loosing his life, the stage-coach having upset in consequence of the horses running away.

A "Long Article" will be found on our first page. It is so connected, however, that we could not think of dividing it; and we are sure that those who read it through will not wish it shortened.

IN MEMORY OF ROSWELL RANDALL,

Of Brookfield, N. Y. Died Nov. 13, 1844, Æ. 28.

"O spare me, that I may recover strength, before I go hence to be here no more."—Ps. 39: 13.

Was it not written on his thoughtful brow,
O'er which the shadows of the grave were cast
Even in his childhood? Early did he bow,
A smitten reed, before the searching blast,
Yet sending ever up the gushing wealth
Of his deep inward life; blent with the sigh,
"O spare me 'till the sunny glow of health
Warms my pale cheek; let my free footsteps fly
O'er the green earth, beneath the summer sky,
Exulting in the strength of life's young energy."

The bright hours pass, and youth glides gently on,
Yet wearing ever that cold fatal seal—
"O spare me, 'till my thirsty soul bows down
At Wisdom's fount—shakes off the darkling spell
That bears it earthward—bursts the secret springs
Of Science—sees the shadowy mantle cleft
From Truth—and in its inmost worshipings,
Has welcomed life, and thanked God for the gift;
Then might I, in my gathered strength, lay down
The pilgrim's staff and shell, for victory's harp and crown."

Youth yields to manhood; still the wasting flame
His vitals nurse, and still the prayer ascends—
"Spare me, O God, not for the breath of Fame,
Nor yet for weary age; but gentle friends
With such a weight of love and tenderness
Press on my heart—I would not pass away
Without that charm of life, the power to bless—
Not for a name on tablets that decay,
But mirror'd in the heart's deep tranquil springs,
Where love and memory dip their time-soil'd weary wings."

And eagerly he folded to his heart
Life's holy destinies, affection tried,
The high resolve, the noble spirit's part,
To will, to suffer, and submissive bide
The Eternal fiat. Yet the prayer went up
Like incense from the accepted sacrifice—
"Spare me, O Father, still withhold the cup
I would not drink in weakness; I would rise
Girt with thy strength to meet the fate defer'd,
Ere I go hence where earth's sad wail is never heard."

And closer in life's silken meshes bound,
And firmer, his deep heart its fetters wove
Earth's purest sanctuary of rest around.
As in the shelt'ring ark the weary dove
Plumed its tired wings for unreturning flight,
So, with his love's own gathered wealth he came—
And at the altar whose empyreal light
Shed its mild radiance on his wasting frame,
Planted his household tree—the Eden-born
Sent out its boughs for him, a rose without a thorn.

And now, what waits he for? Why lingers still
The soaring spirit? All bright gifts are his.
"O spare me, 'till in one long last farewell,
My childhood's friends their son and brother bless.
And now, dear ones, adieu. 'Tis given at length
With the quick ebbings of this mortal power,
Even at the gate of death, the all-conquering strength,
Thus to go hence. Therefore I bless the hour
That wins me upward. It is gain to die,
With Jesus Christ, the Rock of my salvation, nigh."

Shiloh, New Jersey. L. M. C.

The West.—We find in the Christian Watchman a letter from a traveler in the West, appealing for more laborers in that vast and important part of our country. The writer refers to the present state of things in several of the western and south-western cities, and expresses his belief, "that among the chief defects hitherto, has been the want of efficient and well adapted Baptist ministers." The letter concludes:—

"Well educated ministers, no matter where or how educated, imbued largely with the spirit of their Master, able to preach, and not generally obliged to read instead, having good common sense, with their faculties exercised to discern clearly and quickly between the essential and circumstantial, and how far the latter may be sacrificed so as to promote the former, who have warm hearts and a generous regard for the good and the true, wherever seen, and however diluted and obscured—such men need not fear a failure in either of these cities."

Massachusetts and South Carolina.—Mr. Hoar, the agent of Massachusetts to South Carolina, has furnished the Governor with a statement of facts connected with his expulsion from Charleston. It agrees pretty nearly with the report which we at first published, and shows that lynch law is still the resort in that State when the interests of slavery demand it. The statement closes as follows:—

"Some questions of a grave character force themselves on the mind. Has the Constitution of the United States the least practical validity or binding force in South Carolina, excepting where she thinks its operation favorable to her? She prohibits the trial of actions in the tribunals established under the constitution for determining such cases, in which a citizen of Massachusetts complains that a citizen of South Carolina has done him an injury; saying that she has already tried that cause, and decided against the plaintiff. She prohibits, not only by her mobs, but by her Legislature, the residence of a free white citizen of Massachusetts within the limits of South Carolina, whenever she thinks his presence there inconsistent with her policy! Are the other States of the Union to be regarded as the conquered provinces of South Carolina?"

Hamilton Literary and Theological Institution.—From a Catalogue of this institution for 1844–5, we learn that in its Theological Department there are 38 students; in its Collegiate Department there are 20 Seniors, 45 Juniors, 37 Sophomores, 36 Freshmen; in the Academic Department there are 39 members of the First Class, and 20 of the Second Class; Total 235. The institution is open to young men who have the ministry in view, from every denomination of evangelical Christians; and the literary departments are open, under certain restrictions, to young men who have not the ministry in view.

Day of Fasting and Prayer.—We learn that the day of fasting and prayer recommended by the General Conference was extensively and profitably observed among the churches. In many cases, substantial proof was given of an interest in the object for which the day was set apart.

Prayer and Practice.—The first Monday of the present year was in many places religiously observed with special reference to the conversion of the world. A gentleman who had recently given $150 to the American Tract Society, forwarded on that day $250 more, with this sentiment:—"Go on, until the whole number of colporteurs that may be usefully employed are in the field—say twelve or fifteen hundred. Let the men be enlisted, trained, and sent forth. We have been praying this day for the conversion of the world."

Important Discovery.—A writer in the New England Puritan claims to have made the very important discovery that immersion is not Christian baptism. He certainly deserves the thanks of his brethren, and will undoubtedly receive an honorable notice from ecclesiastical historians in ages to come. Six arguments he brings to prove his position; and after having presented them, he closes with the following protestation of his charity:—

"I do not consider any one baptized who has been immersed, and to one having a predilection for immersion who should ask admission to my church, I should give most earnest counsel to turn him from his error. I would not exclude such an one from Christian fellowship, nor from the communion table. If he was satisfied with his baptism, he should commune on his own faith, and not on mine; yet would I leave no instruction untried to show him that, though immersed, he had not yet obeyed the command which enjoins Christian baptism on all the children of God."

Loss of Mission Property.—The Indian Manual Labor establishment connected with the Methodist Episcopal Mission among the Cherokees, suffered damage recently, in a fierce tornado, to the estimated amount of $3,000.

Joshua Leavitt, one of the editors of the Boston Chronicle and Emancipator, has been deprived of a reporter's desk in the House of Representatives at Washington. The reason given is, that there are not desks sufficient for all the applicants; and as the rules of the House gave the Speaker no right to admit reporters to whom he could assign no seats, he was obliged to select according to his discretion, and had done so in this case. Mr. Leavitt complains, however, that seats are assigned to some who do not deserve or need them, and thinks that his connection with the liberty party is the real cause of his rejection.

The Duel.—For several days past two members of Congress, Messrs. Clingman and Yancey, with their friends, have been running about from place to place, to escape from the police, and disgrace themselves by exchanging shots with each other. The difficulty grew out of remarks made last week in the House of Representatives respecting the frauds of the late election. All the efforts of friends to produce a reconciliation or adjustment of the difficulty proved ineffectual. The meeting took place on Monday the 13th inst., near Beltsville, Md. The weapons were pistols, and the distance 12 paces. Just as all things were ready, the police made their appearance, which so hastened the matter, that both parties fired before the proper word was given, and both shots were harmless. After this the seconds interfered, a reconciliation was effected, when the belligerents shook hands and started for Washington.

Bishop Onderdonk.—It is difficult to divine what will be the result of the conviction of this prelate of the Episcopal Church. The high-church party and the low-church party have each a paper published in this city, through which their respective views and plans are communicated to the public, and in which the most authentic information about such matters would naturally be expected. Both of these papers have published articles on the subject—one advocating the cause of the Bishop, and the other sustaining the verdict pronounced against him by the Court. Neither of them, however, express an opinion as to the final issue. The low-church paper evidently hopes that the suspended Bishop will resign the episcopate, while the high-church paper exhorts the Bishop's friends not to mention the word or entertain the thought of resignation. These facts make it probable that there is trouble yet to be met.

THE CASE OF BISHOP ONDERDONK.

The painful result of the recent trial of Bishop Onderdonk on charges affecting his moral character has already been announced. The following is a copy of the official record of the sentence:

Official Sentence in the Case of Bishop Onderdonk.—The Court of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church, convened under the authority of Canon III, of 1844, of the General Convention of said Church, for the trial of the presentment of the Right Reverend Benjamin Tredwell Onderdonk, Bishop of the Diocess of New York, by the Right Reverend William Mead, Bishop of the diocese of Virginia, the Right Reverend James Hervey Otey, Bishop of the diocese of Tennessee, and the Right Reverend Stephen Elliott, Junior, Bishop of the diocese of Georgia, upon certain charges and specifications in said presentment set forth; having fully heard the allegations and testimonies of the parties, and deliberately considered the same, and a majority of the said Court having declared that in their opinion the accused is guilty of certain of the charges and specifications contained in the presentment; which declaration of a majority of the Court has been reduced to writing, and signed by those who assented thereto, and has been pronounced in the presence of the parties; and the Court having proceeded, after hearing the accused, to pass sentence upon the accused in accordance with the provisions of said canon, and having determined that the penalty to be affixed and pronounced in said case shall be that of suspension.

It is hereby ordered and declared that the sentence of this Court upon the respondent, is suspension of the office of a Bishop in the Church of God, and from all the functions of the sacred ministry; and this Court do hereby solemnly pronounce and declare that the Right Reverend Benjamin Tredwell Onderdonk is suspended from all exercise of his Episcopal and ministerial functions; and do order that the notice of this sentence, required by said canon, be communicated by the Presiding Bishop, under his hand and seal, to the ecclesiastical authority of every diocese of this Church.

Given under my hand and seal this the 3d day of [Seal.] January, A. D. 1845.
PHILANDER CHASE, Senior Bishop,
and President of the Court.

BETTING UPON ELECTIONS.

A vast amount of money was staked and lost upon the result of the late election. The mere losing and winning of the money, however, is but a small part of the evil. Its influence upon the election itself, and upon the morals of the people, is indefinitely more important and disastrous. We are glad to see that the subject is attracting attention in the right quarter, among men who are most influenced by elections. The following extract on the subject is from the late Message of Gov. Wright of New York. It is timely and wise.

Another point of much more serious complaint, is the extensive and rapidly increasing practice of betting upon elections, and the interested, selfish, and corrupting tendencies which it exerts upon the election itself. It is true, that bets so made cannot now be recovered by action, or payment enforced in any legal manner, and that property or money, staked, or even paid over upon a bet, may be recovered back in a suit at law; and yet it is equally true, that a public opinion exists, almost universally, so strongly condemnatory of the conduct of him, who having made a bet, refuses the payment; or, having paid, seeks to recover back the money, as to have almost the force of positive law, to compel the payment. Indood, instances have existed, where bankruptcy has been the consequence, to the loosing party, and yet pecuniary ruin has been preferred to a resort to the protection of this statute. Under such a state of things, the law is wholly ineffective, to prevent the practice, as its alarming increase too clearly proves.

Still the evil influences of the practice upon our elections, and the propriety of interposing by legislation to avert them, are fully recognized in the present law. These improper and corrupting influences have made themselves manifest to the whole body of our freemen, and constitute a theme of almost universal complaint. Upon the party to the wager they are controling. His ear and his mind, from the moment his money is staked, are closed against argument, or reason, or examination, either as to the qustion involved, or the candidates presented for his suffrage. He must so vote and so act as to win his bet, and the welfare of the country becomes an entirely secondary consideration. His appeals to all over whom he may hope to exert an influence, are to save himself from loss, and help him to win the money of his opponent, not to examine and inquire how they may best serve their country by their votes.

The manner in which this evil practice extends itself, presents another and even stronger reason for its more effectual suppression. It operates as a positive coercion upon many who are really unwilling to make bets, because it is made a test, by the members of the contending parties, of the confidence of each other in the strength of their causes and their candidates, and their final party success. The offer of the bet is often the consequence of heated discussion and strong partizan feeling, made by one who, without excitement, would netiher offer nor accept a bet upon an election, and yet once made and reluctantly accepted, the same coercion prevents either party from receding; the wager remains, and they become parties to a bet upon the pending election, and subject to all the selfish and corrupting influences which have been described, though both feeling a repugnance to the practice. To avert these evil influences from such parties, and save them from the coercion of so artificial and imaginary a test of political sincerity and confidence, if it can be done without a violation of principle, is certainly most desirable, and would be a valuable improvement in our legislation.

Many have suggested disfranchisement as the penalty of becoming a party to a bet, upon the very rational ground that he should not be permitted to vote at all, whose vote is to be governed by his private interest, and not with reference to the public good. The suggestion, however plausibly urged, we have not the constitutional power to adopt. The Constitution of our State declares the qualifications and disqualifications of the voter, and does not give to the Legislature the right to subtract from the one or add to the other. Its whole power in the matter is to pass laws for ascertaining the constitutional qualifications. The suggestion which strikes me with most force, and as most likely to arrest the practice of betting, is to make it punishable criminally; to subject the parties to every bet made upon the result of an election, to indictment, and upon conviction, to punishment by a fine, to be graduated by the amount of the wager, and to all the costs of the prosecution. If the fine be given entirely to the complainant, the probability of prosecution, and consequently of arresting the evil, will be strengthened.

No valid objection in principle against such a law has occurred to me. The deleterious influence of this species of gambling upon the public morals alone, would, it appears to me, justify the passage of a law which should make it criminal. And when its corrupt and corrupting tendencies upon our Elections, upon the free and proper exercise of the elective franchise; when its influence to bring the improper expenditure of money into a political canvass, and to apply it under the desperate impulse of a gambling spirit, are considered, I cannot doubt that the moral and political aspect of the evil will fully justify its classification as a crime, and its punishment as such.

Protest against Superstition.—Johanne Ronge, a Catholic priest at Laurahutte, Germany, has published a letter censuring severely Bishop Arnoldi, the Catholic Bishop of Treves, for practicing a gross imposition upon the people, by exhibiting for public show and adoration, a relic, said to be the coat of Christ, and possessed of the power of healing the sick. Five hundred thousand persons, he says, have hurried to Treves, as pilgrims to this relic, and thousands are flocking to it daily.

A Revolt in a Synagogue.—A letter from Algiers states that the annual Jewish Fete terminated by a sort of disturbance in the synagogue. It is the custom for the chief of the congregation to proceed to the synagogue of Ben Naray, to adjudge the privilege of reading the Bible for that day to the highest bidder, the sum obtained being appropriated to the use of the synagogue. When, on this occasion, the chief came forward, he was greeted by the persons present with hooting and cries. Some of the most turbulent declared that they enjoyed the utmost extent of liberty under the French government, and did not want the chief. They then attempted to turn him out, and he was obliged to call in the gendarmerie. As the Government recognizes his office, his application was attended to, and about fifty of the rioters were arrested. The matter is under investigation.

General Intelligence.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

[Compiled for the Recorder.]

Monday, Jan. 6.

In the House, the whole day was occupied in discussing the question of annexing Texas. Mr. Winthrop of Mass. spoke an hour against it as unconstitutional and calculated to extend slavery. Mr. Douglass of Ill. spoke an hour in fovor of annexation. Mr. Clingman of North Carolina next obtained the floor, and occupied his hour in replying to an assertion of Mr. Douglass, that the people at the last election had decided in favor of annexation. Mr. Yancey of Alabama then took the floor, and the House soon after adjourned.

In the Senate, several resolutions were presented, the bill on postage was reported with amendments, several petitions of a private nature and on Texas were read, and reports from Committees made—when the Senate adjourned.

Tuesday, Jan. 7.

The House was mostly occupied with the Texas question. Yancey of Alabama, and Bayley of Virginia, spoke in favor of annexation. Stetson of New York spoke partly for and partly against it.

In the Senate, Mr. Tappan presented the protest of Ohio against annexation; and Mr. Niles introduced joint resolutions to annex Texas as a State.

Wednesday, Jan. 8.

In the House, Mr. Dromgoole introduced a bill declaring the consent of Congress that a new State be formed within the jurisdiction of the Republic of Texas and admitted into the Union. It was referred to committee of the whole. Annexation was again the topic. A speech was made for it, and another against it.

In the Senate no business of great importance was transacted.

Thursday, Jan. 9.

In the House, after the transaction of some unimportant business, the Texas question was discussed by about half a dozen members until the hour of adjournment.

In the Senate, remonstrances from Boston and Connecticut were presented by Mr. Choate. A memorial was presented for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. There was also a debate on the Smithsonian bequest, after which the Senate adjourned until Monday.

Friday and Saturday, Jan. 10 and 11.

The Senate was not in session either day.

In the House, several unimportant or private bills were passed, and several communications from the President and different departments were received. Most of the time was occupied, however, in a warm discussion of the Texas question, in which Messrs. Sample of Indiana, Dean of Ohio, Kennedy of Maryland, Morse of Louisiana, and Tibbatts of Kentucky, took part—some being for and some against it.

Monday, January 13.

House.—A bill was passed authorizing the sale of the two Arabian horses presented to the President by the Imaun of Muscat. Another plan for annexing Texas was proposed; after which the House went into committee of the whole, and resumed the Texas discussion. Messrs. Tibbatts, Brinkerhoff, Chappell, and Holmes, were the speakers, and continued until the time of adjournment.

Senate.—Several petitions were presented for a change in the naturalization laws, for the annexation of Texas, for a territorial government in Oregon, and for the relief of individuals having claims against the Government. The Senate then held an executive session, after which it adjourned.

Case of Dorr.—The Committee of the Rhode Island Legislature to whom was referred the petition of certain "Clergymen, ladies and others," for the unconditional liberation of Thomas W. Dorr, met on Saturday for the purpose of hearing the petitioners, by their counsel. Rev. Martin Cheney, of Olneyville, one of the ablest Clergymen of the Freewill Baptist denomination, appeared in behalf of the petitioners. The Providence Journal says:

"Mr. Cheney spoke for about an hour in a handsome and appropriate manner. The friends of Mr. Dorr could not have placed his cause in worthier hands. He urged all the considerations which can be urged in favor of unconditional liberation, in good temper and good taste, with simple and earnest eloquence, and when he sat down every one must have felt that the case of Mr. Dorr had for once been well managed. It was about the first time that he might not well have prayed to be saved from his friends."

The Journal adds:

"We think that the General Assembly will pass an act extending a pardon to Thomas W. Dorr on the same terms that it has been extended to the inferior actors in the treason of which he was the head."

Distress in Philadelphia.—The Rev. John Susset, to whose kindness I am indebted for many facilities, has furnished the following picture of distress in this city. During the past month, Mr. S. has distributed $656 75 to the worthy poor; also, 50 cords of wood and 5½ tons of coal, to 208 needy families, together with food, clothing, &c., to widows and others. Mr. S. mentions the case of a widow residing in Spring Garden, who has five small children, one with its back broken, all dependent upon the efforts of the mother, who goes out washing and leaves her little ones in the charge of the eldest, who is eight years of age. In the western part of the city there is a lady who at one period of her life was quite wealthy—but who is now exactly the reverse. Her husband is afflicted with the palsy, they have six children, one of them lame—and so needy have they been that for weeks they have gone without meat. The case of a poor widow with six children, residing in Apple street, is mentioned. Also, that of a lady and her two children, now in a state of much suffering. But a short time ago there were in the family twelve persons. The husband and father died, leaving his wife and ten children. He had two vessels at sea, and was considered worth some fifteen thousand dollars. The vessels were both lost, there was no insurance on either, and thus in the midst of supposed wealth she found herself poor. In a very short time the heart-broken mother laid, beside the grave of her husdand, eight of her children. During the struggle of sickness and of death, all her furniture was disposed of. She opened a boarding-house—that failed. She then went out to nurse, and in that capacity, which promised her a home and the means of supporting her two surviving children, she was struck with the palsy. By this sad dispensation of Providence, she lost the use of her left hand. The benevolent reader may well imagine the condition of affairs under these circumstances. Several other distressing cases are mentioned—all going to show that the field for the exercise of philanthropy is a wide one in Philadelphia, and that the generous and humane may contribute of their abundance, satisfied that it will be devoted to deserving objects of charity.

[Phil. Cor. of Tribune.

Awful Steamboat Accident.—On Saturday, the 28th ult. the steamboat Capitol from Pittsburgh to St. Louis, while lying at St. Mary's landing, 70 miles below the latter place, was destroyed by fire. Most of the passengers were asleep, but, with the exception of three, escaped. The flames spread upwards and through the cabin, so swiftly that several of those in the cabin effected their escape by letting themselves down on the after guards. the wind was blowing a strong breeze from the bow to the stern, which drove the flames aft.

A Mr. Dalrymple, his wife, a son (Master Joseph D.) and daughter, a young lady, were passengers on board. The father and son occupied a state-room in the gentlemen's cabin—the mother and daughter a room in the ladies' cabin. From the best accounts we can gather, says the St. Louis (Missouri,) Republican, it is most probable Mr. Dalrymple and his son perished in their state-room. They had been awakened by the Captain, and this is the last that is certainly known of them. Mrs. D. and her daughter reached the cabin, when the mother fainted and fell; the flames rushing in, the daughter had barely time to save her life, by letting herself down on the after guard. Thus, the father, mother and son, it is believed, perished in the flames Mr. D. was from Lynn, Mass., and was moving to a farm in the vicinity of Carlinville, Ill. He had on board a large amount of valuable property, all of which was lost.

A Mr. McLane and his lady had barely time to escape in the clothes in which they were sleeping. Mr. McL. had upwards of $5,500 in gold in his trunk, which was lost.

Important Sale.—In pursuance of an act of the Legislature, passed April 20, 1844, the main line of the Public Works of Pennsylvania will be offered at public sale on Monday morning, the 20th inst., at the Philadelphia Exchange, the stock to be divided into 200,000 shares of $100 each, amounting to twenty millions of dollars. Already has this matter excited considerable interest, and the sale will no doubt be numerously attended by most of the leading capitalists of the United States. It is extremely doubtful, however, whether purchasers will be found at the price named.

Another Anti-Rent Outrage.—Mr. Flanagan, a private of the Albany Emmet Guards, while standing on guard in front of the Hudson House, at three o'clock this morning, was fired at by a stranger on horseback. The horseman rode to within 20 feet of the Hotel, faced his horse to the guard, and when challenged, drew a horse-pistol and fired it at Mr. F. The ball passed within three inches of Mr. F., and going through one of the heavy pillars of the colonade, lodged in the corner of the house. It was a bold attempt at assassination, and has caused a deep excitement.

Wholesale Slaughter of Witches.—During the 17th century 40,000 persons are said to have been put to death for witchcraft in England alone! In Scotland the number was probably, in proportion to the population, much greater; for it is certain that, even in the last forty years of the 16th century, the executions were not fewer than 17,000. In 1734 the madness may be said to have reached its highest pitch; for in that year occurred the celebrated case of the Lancashire witches, in which eight innocent persons were deprived of their lives by the incoherent falsehoods of a mischievous urchin. The civil war, far from suspending the persecution, seems to have redoubled it. In 1644'45 the infamous Matthew Hopkins was able to earn a livelihood by the profession of witch finder, which he exercised, not indeed without occasional suspicion, but still with general success. And even twenty years later the delusion was sanctioned by the most venerable name of the English law! for it was in 1684, that the excellent Sir Matthew Hale, after a trial conducted with his usual good sense, condemned two women to death as witches, both of whom were executed accordingly.

Business Men of New York.—It is stated in Hunt's Merchant's Magazine, that Preserved Fish commenced life as an apprentice to a blacksmith, and his next situation was that of a seaman on board a whaling-ship. From being a hand before the mast, he rose to be a mate, and finally commander, and in this hazardous pursuit he amassed the foundation of his fortune. Saul Alley was bound, when a small boy, an apprentice to a coach maker. During his apprenticeship his father died, and left him totally dependent on his own exertions. The very chothes he wore he was obliged to earn by toiling extra hours, after the regular time of leaving off work had passed. The foundation of his fortune he acquired by the exercise of frugality and prudence, while a journeyman mechanic Cornelius W. Lawrence, late mayor of New York, now President of the Bank of the State of New York, was a farmer's boy and worked many a long day in rain and sunshine on Long Island. There were few lads within twenty miles of him that could mow a wider swarth, or turn a neater furrow. These men have been the architects of their own fortunes; they have earned them by the sweat of their brows; and their very wealth, besides the other means of doing good to their fellow men which it puts in their power, is, in itself a perpetual stimulus to the mechanic and artisan to earn a similar reward by similar frugality, industry and perseverance.

The Season.—We hear but one remark about the weather this winter—how mild it is, and almost as soft as Spring on some days. It is of the same character in other parts of the country. A most remarkable fact is, that on January 6th, the steamer United States arrived at Detroit, on her passage to Buffalo. The Canal is also open at Cleveland. At New Haven they have had violets blooming in the open air, within the past week, if we can credit the statement we see to that effect. On the whole, a more charming season cannot be imagined, and we can scarcely believe it is winter, when we look into the Park; there is no snow or ice, and blue noses are out of season.

A postage meeting was held in Cincinnati the other day, and Dr. Beecher was present, advocating the most extreme reform with his characteristic energy:—

"I am a representative of a class of persons," said the venerable divine, "who suffer more from this exorbitant tax than most men, as our correspondence is usually great, and our means small. I have paid $4000 during my life upon letters which grew out of my clerical duties, and the burthen was heaviest when I was poorer than I am now. I want to be relieved of this, if practicable, for the rest of my life." Again, he said, "I have given a large family to my country, and it has been so ordered, that whenever I receive a letter from my absent children, the postage has most frequently been twenty-five cents. This is too heavy a tax upon the domestic intercourse of the people."

'The Branded Hand.'—Proposals have been issued for publishing at Providence a small monthly journal with this title, the object of which will be to excite the sympathy of the North in behalf of those unfortunate persons who are confined in Southern prisons for assisting Slaves to run away. The title was of course suggested by the branded hand of Walker, now imprisoned in Florida.

Connected with the Catholic Church we find 6,129 persons—nobles and proprietors 2,652; connected with Literature and the Fine Arts 3,710; shopkeepers and tradesmen 37,202; servants 12,128; laborers on public works and beggars 1,913; youths and individuals of both sexes without any fixed condition, 81,230.

Domestic Slave Trade.—A resolution has been introduced into the Legislature of Alabama, prohibiting the introduction of slaves for merchandize, or for establishing plantations, except by emigrants and citizens. It was referred to a committee of nine, after some considerable confusion. It is intended only to abolish the practice of carrying on large plantations by persons residing in other States.

WITHIN AND WITHOUT.

BY BARRY CORNWALL.

(WITHOUT.)

The winds are bitter, the skies are wild:
From the roof comes plunging the drowning rain,
Without, in tatters, the world's poor child
Sobbeth abroad her grief, her pain!
No one heareth her, no one heedeth her;
But Hunger, her friend, with his bony hand,
Grasps her throat, whispering huskily,
"What dost thou in a Christian land?"

(WITHIN.)

The skies are wild, and the blast is cold;
Yet riot and luxury brawl within;
Slaves are waiting, in crimson and gold,
Waiting the nod of a child of sin.
The fire is crackling, wine is bubbling
Up in each glass to its loaded brim;
The jesters are laughing, the parasites quaffing
"Happiness," "honor," and all for him!

(WITHOUT.)

She who is slain in the winter weather,
Ah! she once had a village fame;
Listened to love on the moonlit heather
Had gentleness, vanity, maiden shame;
Now her allies are the tempest howling;
Prodigal's curses; self disdain;
Poverty; misery. Well no matter;
There is an end unto every pain!

The harlot's fame was her doom to day,
Disdain, despair, by to-morrow's light
The ragged boards and the pauper's pall;
And so she'll be given to dusty night;
Without a tear or a human sigh,
She's gone, poor life and its "fever" o'er;
So let her in calm oblivion lie;
While the world runs merry as heretofore;

(WITHIN.)

He who yon lordly feast enjoyeth,
He who doth rest on his couch of down,
He it was that threw the forsaken
Under the feet of the trampling town;
Liar, betrayer, false as cruel,
What is the doom for his dastard sin?
His peers, they scorn? high dames, they shun him?
Unbar your palace, and gaze within!

There,—yet his deeds are all trumpet-sounded,—
There upon silken seats recline
Maidens as fair as the summer morning,
Watching him rise from the sparkling wine.
Mothers all proffer their stainless daughters;
Men of high honor salute him "friend:"
Skies! oh, where are your cleansing waters;
World! oh, where will thy wonders end?

MY FIRST VOYAGE,

OR

THE PRODIGAL RECLAIMED.

I remember as though it were yesterday, the morning on which I first stepped on board the good ship B——, bound out on a three years' whaling voyage, round the Cape of Good Hope. I was a thoroughly "raw hand," and had never been out of sight of land, when I entered the B. as a common sailor, to serve out my time as I best might, before the mast. All was new and strange to me, and when I looked up to the tall, slender spars, and saw the men fearless in climbing to their very top, among the rigging, my brain turned round, and a sickening sensation came over me, so much like fear, that I walked to the side of the vessel, and hid my face for very shame. It was well for me that I had a kind and considerate captain, who understood just how to make allowance for my ignorance and inexperience, so that if I had to endure many a practical joke from my shipmates on account of my awkwardness, I was always sure of an encouraging word or look from him. On the whole, I got along far more comfortably than I expected, though when I thought of home, and of the mother who was there weeping and praying for her sailor boy, my heart would melt, and threaten to overflow at my eyes.

In truth, it was no enthusiastic love of glory, no strong passion for the sea, which had tempted me from my home and friends. I had a father who possessed wealth and influence; whose education, talents, and moral character, secured for him an elevated standing in society. I had a mother, (heaven bless her memory,) who seemed to my young heart the very embodiment of my ideas of angelic sweetness and excellence, and I was her only child.—What then had I to do in my present situation? Why had I left the lap of ease and indulgence, for the hardships and exposures of a whaling voyage? Alas, the answer is soon given. Prosperity and unbounded indulgence had produced on me their usual ill effects, and so wild and wayward had I become, that I spurned the control of my father, and could even resist the tender entreaties of my angel mother, until my obstinacy was past even their endurance. Long and patiently they tried every method to reclaim their erring but still beloved boy, and very slowly did they admit the conviction to their aching hearts, that no ordinary means could avail to win me back to virtue. For myself, I look back on that part of my life, as on a frightful dream. I was reckless and hardened—resolved to have my own way, and to indulge to the utmost all the desires of my evil heart, and the cold severity of my justly incensed father, increased, if possible, the strength of my determination.—But when I saw the pale and care-worn, though still mild countenance of my mother—when I witnessed her streaming tears as she prayed in secret for her wayward child, or met her tender, yet reproachful glance, my hardihood all vanished, my spirit was subdued, and I longed to throw myself a weeping penitent, on the bosom where I had so often lain in my happy infancy and childhood. A false shame at such moments, held me back, and I should undoubtedly have made my own destruction sure, had not my mad career been stopped in an unexpected manner.

As we lived in a village far inland, I had scarcely ever thought of a seafaring life, and certainly never in connection with myself. How great then was my astonishment, when my father informed me, he had decided as a last resort, on sending me to sea, for a three years' voyage in a whale ship, adding, that we were to leave home for New Bedford the following morning. I knew from his manner that remonstrance would be useless, and was not yet so far gone in sin, as to determine on open disobedience; so in silence and sadness I prepared to obey his directions, in making ready for our departure. I saw but little of my mother during the remainder of the day, though continually reminded of her, by a thousand little preparations for my comfort, which only a mother's heart would have suggested.

But after I had retired at night, with the bitter consciousness that it was the last time for years, and possibly for ever, that I should sleep under a roof, from which my own folly had driven me, my mother came to my bed-side, and with a tremulous voice, laid open before me, her loving, but lacerated heart. She uttered no words of reproach, and spoke of the past, only as furnishing motives for a better improvement of the time to come. Of my future prospects, she spoke cheerfully and with hope, should the reformation so much desired, be effected—otherwise she warned me most solemnly of the consequences of continuing in my present state of impenitence and sin. She told me of the snares that would be spread for my feet in my new situation, and depicted in glowing colors, the dangers to which the poor sailor is exposed on shore, from the avarice and wickedness of those who live on his hard-earned wages, and lie in wait at every corner to deceive and destroy him. In the strong accents of maternal love, she bade me beware of companionship with her "whose steps take hold on hell," whose ways lead down to eternal death. "Among your clothes," she said in conclusion, "you will find a Bible, the parting gift of a mother who loves you, and would gladly shelter you with her life from every evil. Take it, my son, as your chosen friend—the man of your counsel, a lamp to guide safely and surely your inexperienced feet. If you believe, love and obey its blessed precepts, we shall meet in peace again, if not here, yet surely in that better world, where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest." After praying with me, she withdrew, leaving me in a state of self-condemnation and wretchedness such as I had never before experienced. During the silent watches of that long night, my whole past life came up in review before me, and I clearly saw how madly and wilfully I had squandered the rich blessings of Providence, stabbed my parents to the heart, and thrown away the most brilliant prospects—all for what? for the wages which Satan always gives his deluded followers—disappointment and misery.

At length the morning came, and after our early meal had been sent away untasted, and we had knelt for the last time together around the domestic altar, the moment of our departure arrived. When I received the parting embrace of my beloved mother, when I felt her warm tears on my cheek, and heard her solemnly pronounced blessing on the youthful exile, I longed to give vent to my feelings, and weep like a very child. But the pride of manhood was strong within me, so choking down the sobs that swelled my bosom almost to suffocation, I followed my father to the carriage, hastily and in silence.

During that sad, and as it seemed to me, tedious journey, my father's manner was kind though serious, and for the first time I was compelled, day after day, to commune with my own heart, and listen to its upbraidings. Before we reached New Bedford, my spirit was greatly subdued, and as I received my father's parting admonitions, and his tender farewell, I mentally resolved to retrace my steps, and atone as far as possible for my faults, by a strict attention to all the duties of my new situation. This resolution, though formed in a blind dependence on my own strength, which is perfect weakness, God graciously enabled me in some degree to keep, so that I soon gained the confidence of my superiors, and was regarded by my shipmates as a "good-hearted fellow," though too much of a "landlubber" to command their unqualified approbation. There was one among them, however, to whom I became strongly attached, and who exerted an influence over me, for which I shall bless God to all eternity.

This was the boat steerer, a "regular old salt," to whom the ocean, in its wildest moods, was a play-thing, and his ship, his only home. Always first on hand in any stirring service, true as steel to his commander and his duty, and brave as a lion, he was the favorite of all the crew, and I learned to admire his seaman-like qualities, before I knew or suspected that beneath his rough exterior was concealed one of the warmest and kindest hearts that ever beat in a sailor's bosom. How often, during the first months of my life on ship-board, was I indebted to his quick wit and ready hand, for my escape from the ridicule of my messmates, and the displeasure of my superiors. I cannot think even now, without tears of gratitude, of his repeated interpositions in my behalf, when my ignorance would otherwise have subjected me to certain punishment. His influence in the forecastle was greater than that of any other man on board, and even in the cabin, he was evidently respected and beloved. It was not long, before I discovered the secret of my shipmate's superior excellence. "Long Tom," as he was familiarly called, from his great height, was a sincere Christian. He went daily to his Bible, to take orders from the great Captain of his salvation, and from that Chart, he learned how to steer his course, so as to avoid those fatal rocks and quicksands on which so many a poor sailor has made shipwreck both for time and eternity.

Many months had passed since I left my home, and though the image of my mother was continually present with me, I had never once breathed her name to my companions, and felt as if it would be profanation to speak that sacred name among those who knew nothing of her worth, and could not appreciate the love and veneration which had become a part of my very being. But, one moon-light night, while cruising off the Cape, I chanced to be on watch with Long Tom, and we were beguiling the time by admiring the splendor of the constellations, which in those southern latitudes, are indescribably beautiful.

"It is a curious fancy," said my companion, "and may be only a superstition of the brain, but there is one star in that Southern Cross, which is always associated in my mind with the memory of my dear old mother. I could almost believe when I gaze upon it, that her blessed spirit now inhabits it, and is looking down on me with eyes of love. Boy," he added with startling earnestness, "Have you a mother?" My heart was full to overflowing before he addressed me, for there was something in the deep stillness of the night, the calm grandeur of the boundless ocean, and the quiet beauty of the holy stars that were set as watches in the azure firmament above us, which subdued my soul to the tenderness of infancy. Moved by an impulse I could not resist, I threw myself on the deck, and gave full vent to my emotions. Long and bitterly I wept, before I could answer the simple question of Long T and then I told him all my story of sin and shame, without one attempt at extenuation or concealment. I poured out the burning thoughts of my mother, of her love, and tenderness, and goodness, while as I did so, I saw tears quietly stealing down the bronzed and furrowed cheeks of my companion. I told him too of my fixed determination to lead a new life, and to atone to my parents, if spared to see them again, for all the grief I had occasioned them Long Tom heard me patiently and attentively, and when I had ended, took occasion to remind me of the deceitful nature of my own heart, and my absolute need of divine grace to enable me to keep my good resolutions.

"Listen to me," he said, "and though it may be somewhat of a long yarn, I will tell you what God has done for my soul. Do you see, shipmate, if I had just recovered from some dreadful and dangerous sickness, through the skilful care of a kind physician, and then should see you coming down with the same disease, how should I go to work to get you to try the same physician? I would tell you how sick I had been, and how greatly I had suffered. I would tell you, too, of the skill and kindness which had brought me back from the mouth of the grave. So it seems to me we ought to praise the Lord. Here he stands, the great Physician as the Bible calls him, begging poor sin-sick souls to come to him and get a cure; but they go on, maimed and perishing, too proud to confess their need of his assistance, or to accept of a cure at his hands. Here and there, one who has been healed by the blessed Jesus, is telling the story to others, and trying to persuade them to apply in time to this good Physician; the Lord multiply the number of such, whoever they be, a thousand-fold! But to my story.

I was the only son of my mother, and she was a widow. My father, who was the owner and commander of a small fishing smack, was lost while I was yet in my mother's arms, in one of those gales which annually destroy so many lives on the eastern coast of old Massachusetts, leaving his widow with two children, dependent on her own industry for daily bread. But though we were poor, there was no want in our humble dwelling, and my sister and myself grew up as busy as bees, and as happy as the lark which goes soaring up in the glad sunshine, as if to get nearer to God, while praising Him for his goodness. My mother worked hard to provide us with decent clothing, and to send us to school; but she was always cheerful, and made us feel that we had a Father in heaven, who, if we were good children, would love us, and be better to us than all the fathers on earth. Those were bright days, when I loved my mother, and loved my Bible, my school, and the whole world, and feared to do any thing wrong, lest I should offend my Father in heaven.

But as I grew older, other thoughts would come into my mind, in spite of all my attempts to keep them out. I had listened in my childhood to wild tales of the ocean, until my heart was so full of wonder and admiration, that it seemed almost bursting, and then I always exclaimed, "I too will be a sailor."

The childish purpose grew stronger as I advanced in years, though my poor mother's sorrowful look, when I mentioned it before her, made me confine it to my own bosom. After some years of delay, of urgent entreaties on my part, and of repeated refusals on hers, she was at last forced to consent, and I entered the merchant ship Juno, bound to Havre, as cabin boy. How my mother wept as she bade me farewell, and begged the captain to watch over my morals, and guard me from sin. Alas, she little knew what a school of vice her son was entering.—At that time there were no floating Bethels—none who cared for the soul of the poor sailor, who escaped the dangers of the sea, only to go to pieces on worse rocks the moment he touched the shore.

At first, I was greatly shocked at the profanity and wickedness of my shipmates, but I soon found that morality was quite out of place among them, and learned to relish an oath, or an indecent and low song, as well as the best, or rather the worst of them. I was indeed an apt scholar—so that when after two years, I visited my poor mother, though I tried hard to conceal the change, she saw enough to wring her heart with anguish. The restraints of home, the prayers and counsels of my mother, and the tears of my sister, became soon intolerable to me, and I left my native village with the fixed purpose of returning to it no more.

Well, for ten long years I kept my wicked purpose, and never once saw the face of my mother, though a part of my wages was regularly sent to her, sufficient to supply her with the comforts of life. But it was not my money she wanted, and my sinfulness and neglect almost broke her heart. In the mean time, my sister, who was good and gentle as I was rebellious, faded away and died like a flower smitten by the frost, leaving my poor mother alone, with nothing to comfort her but her Bible, and the hope of a better world. But God heard her prayers for her wandering sailor boy, and in his own way answered them, when she had well nigh given me up in despair.

I shall not try to give you any account of a life on which I cannot now look back without the deepest shame and self-abhorrence. It is enough to say, 'I was almost in all evil in the midst of the congregation and assembly.' The moment my foot touched the shore after a long voyage, I was surrounded by harpies in the shape of men, who professed great friendship for me, treated me to a glass of grog, and led me away as an ox to the slaughter, into one of those dens, called sailor boarding-houses, where I was caressed and flattered until my money was gone, and then, I soon found myself turned adrift, without friends or credit, obliged to ship again immediately, or take up my lodging in the streets. Poor Jack has indeed been hardly treated in a Christian land; but, thank God, a brighter day is dawning on him, through the Christian kindness of some of the dear children of Jesus.

But, shipmate, I shall weary your patience with my long yarn, so I will hasten to the time when God met me in my wicked career, and brought me to the knowledge of his dear Son, to whom be glory forever.

It was in a southern port, and on a Sunday, that as I was carelessly strolling along the dock, I saw on a small schooner, a white flag flying at mast head, with the word Bethel, inscribed in large characters upon it. Curiosity and the hope of finding some amusement, drew me towards it, but what was my astonishment on entering the cabin, to find myself in the midst of a religious assembly, all intently listening to the words of life as they fell from the lips of a clergyman who was standing on a raised platform, with an open Bible before him, from which he was reading. The novelty of the scene fixed my attention, and uncovering my head in silence, I involuntarily knelt with the rest of the little congregation during the prayer which followed. After prayer and singing, the minister named his text, and though many long years have passed since that morning, I seem still to hear the solemn tone in which he asked the question—"How shall man be just with God?" In discoursing from these words, he first described the nature of sin, and drew the character of the sinner so exactly to the life, that I felt certain he meant me, and wondered who had been telling him all about my life, aye and my very heart too. I dared not look up, for I thought all the people must know that the preacher was describing me, and there I sat, guilty and self condemned, while the instructions of my youth, and the prayers and tears of my mother all came up before me with fearful distinctness. At length he spoke of Jesus, and as he described his love for sinners, and all he had done to save them, I thought I had never heard these good tidings before, though I had been told all about them a thousand times over from my cradle. The next Sunday I went again to the Bethel ship, and before we sailed, made bold to go to Mr. B. the seamen's preacher, and tell him how much I desired an interest in his prayers, for my soul's salvation. During that voyage I continued low and unhappy, and whenever I could get a chance, read in the Bible which the good minister had given me at parting, with a strict charge not to neglect it for a single day. When next in port, my first care was to find out a Bethel flag, and very soon afterward, while the people of God were engaged in prayer for me, the Lord appeared for my deliverance. He took me out of the horrible pit and mirey clay, set my feet upon a rock and established my goings. He put a new song into my mouth, which I hope to sing forever—even praise to the Lamb. And now you may be sure I wanted to see my dear old mother, to whose prayers and faithfulness, I knew, that under God, I owed my salvation. Accordingly having saved my hard earnings since I knocked off grog, and cards, and bad company, I started for the place where the happiest years of my life had been spent, and where my mother waited and watched for me so long. We were both greatly changed by time, and she did not at first recognize her long lost son, but when I made myself known, and above all when she heard what God had done for my soul, her joy and gratitude were almost too much for her feeble frame. Oh what a meeting, and what a visit we had together! At the grave of my sister, I listened to the story of her short but useful and happy life and her triumphant death, while through her tears my mother exclaimed—"blessed be God, if one dear child has been called away a little before me, another has been given back, whom I feared I had lost forever, Truly 'this my son was dead and is alive again, he was lost and is found.'"

I never saw my mother again, for she died soon after my departure, saying with her last breath—"Now, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for my eyes have seen thy salvation." A few more rising and setting suns, a few more days of toil and trial, and I shall go to be with her, and that dear Saviour who loved me and died for me for ever and ever! I shall bid adieu to sin and sorrow and suffering, and stand in the presence of God where is fulness of joy, and at his right hand where there are pleasures for evermore. "Shipmate, is not such a hope worth having?"

Long Tom looked me full in the face as he ceased speaking, and his countenance actually shone with holy joy and triumph. The great truths of which he had spoken, were familiar to me as "household words," yet they now reached my heart for the first time. The circumstances in which I was placed, and the novelty of hearing such truths from the lips of a sailor, one of a class who have been supposed far enough removed from religious influences, gave them a power I never before felt, and the blessed Spirit of God fastened them on my mind and conscience, so that I could not shake them off. The bible given me by my beloved mother from that night became my constant companion, and I read its sacred pages with ever fresh delight, though many weeks passed away, before I was enabled to apply its precious promises to my own case, or to believe with the heart on him who taketh away the sins of the world.

Ever after that memorable night, a strong bond of union existed between Long Tom and myself, and many were the pleasant hours we spent together in talking of the past the present and the future, At the close of our long and successful voyage, when we reached our native land I bade him farewell with feelings of the deepest affection and regret. Peace to the memory of an excellent and beloved brother! He was not long after, lost in a violent storm off the Coast of Brazil, with his vessel and all her crew, but has found shelter I doubt not, in the haven of everlasting rest, where his hopes had so long been anchored,

I had heard only once from my parents since leaving home, and my anxiety to learn their welfare was intense. What changes might have taken place in that little circle during the three years in which I had been absent! It was with a heart full of conflicting emotions, though joy and hope predominated, that I started out to find an old friend of my father, to whom I had been introduced previous to leaving New Bedford. Almost the first person I met in the streets, was the gentleman of whom I was in search, but when I eagerly accosted him, he turned on me a look of astonishment. He did not recognize in the sun burnt sailor with his checked shirt and tarpaulin, the smart young dandy who had three years before come to New Bedford to encounter the "rough and tumble" of a whaling voyage; but if the external man was altered, the internal one was I hope still more so, and when after warmly welcoming me back again, he said affectionately—"Well C. I hope you are now willing to go home, and be a dutiful son, and carry comfort to the heart of your parents," my heart was on my lips as I answered with tears—"thank God, sir, I believe I am."

If the readers wish to know how the returning prodigal was received by those who gave him birth, I would refer them to the Gospel of Luke, 15th chapter, from the 20th to the 24th verse, where they will find the scene described much better than I could hope to do it. There was joy under that roof, in proportion to the sorrow that had gone before, and never did a warmer thanksgiving ascend to God, than went up from that family altar the evening after my return.

My first voyage was also my last, but though years have since passed away, its incidents are still fresh in memory, and I know full well the heart of a sailor. I rejoice that the day star of hope has at length risen on this noble but neglected class of men, and that so much is doing for their elevation and salvation. May He, whose Spirit dictated these efforts, increase them an hundred fold, and guide them safely and speedily forward to a glorious consummation.

Advocate of Moral Reform.

REFORMED CONVICT LECTURES.—A correspondent of the Journal of Commerce, after alluding to the great good accomplished by the lectures of reformed inebriates, proposes that reformed State Prison convicts should pursue a similar course.—He says:

"There are men of talents who from childhood have pursued a course of crime, and finally been subjected to the penalty of a ten years or more lodgment in the Penitentiary, who through the instrumentality of some philanthropic visitor, or otherwise, have been made deeply to feel, not only their transgression of the laws of their country, but also the law of God,—having been exercised with a deep, thorough sense of sin, became truly penitent, and fled for mercy to the only hope for sinners. Such persons having seen with deep regret the folly of their past lives, and anxious that others (those who have just commenced a course of crime,) should be stopped in their progress of self destruction and brought back from the error of their ways.—I say such penitent and truly renovated men might be abundantly useful,—if they could make the sacrifice,—by facing the world as lecturers on crime, its causes and effects, with a plain history of their own past lives, and recitals of the downward course of others, whose history they have gathered by being partners in wickedness. Lecturers of this description might save many a youth, whose conscience is not yet seared,—and who may be wrought upon by the sympathies of those who have been plucked as brands from the burning.

Dec. 14th, 1844. DWIGHT.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

LEAVES FROM A TRAVELER'S NOTE-BOOK—NO. 12.

THE LONDON POST OFFICE.

The General Post Office in London is a magnificent building, situated in a central part of the city. It was erected under the direction of Sir Robert Smirke, was opened for public business in 1829, and presents such a proof of the amazing extent of intercourse between London and the world at large, that no stranger ought to fail of visiting it. The building occupies an oblong space, and is divided by a grand hall, with which the many different departments communicate. This hall is eighty feet in width, sixty in length, and fifty in height, the arch over it being supported by six stone columns. On one side of it are the newspaper, inland, and ship-letter offices; on the other are various offices for transacting the business of the department. At each side of the entrance are boards, containing lists of persons for whom letters have been received, but whose residences are not known. A person seeing his own name, or the name of a friend here, has only to write the residence on the remainder of the line, and the letter will be presented within twenty-four hours. Running off from the central hall on one side, is a smaller hall where the bags are received from the mails, and conveyed to the sorters' and carriers' offices—rooms more than a hundred feet long, containing such an immense number of drawers, boxes, and pigeon-holes, that they must be seen to be appreciated. On the other side is a staircase leading to the offices for dead and mis-sent letters. Under the great hall is a tunnel containing some curious machinery for conveying letters from one office to another in different parts of the building. The basement story is appropriated to the mail-guards' rooms and the armory; the second floor and upper story contain sleeping rooms for clerks, etc.

It is worth while to visit the great hall for half an hour before the office closes at night. As the time approaches, men and boys come hurrying in, all out of breath, with the last letters and papers for the mails. At length the great clock begins to strike, and what a commotion!—large men running over small ones, and small men who have delivered their packages dodging here and there to get out of the way of large ones, until, with the last stroke of the clock, all the receiving windows drop, and the successful or disappointed are left to sorrow or rejoice with each other. Another hour at which it will interest the stranger to visit the office is on the departure of the mails for all parts of the kingdom, which takes place at precisely eight o'clock every evening. The different vehicles generally collect in the enclosed space around the building a quarter of an hour before the time, and the gates are guarded by men in livery. When the clock strikes, the last parcel is handed up to each—and off they start, one after another in quick succession, the fresh horses gaily prancing, and the horns merrily sounding from the different quarters to which the coaches diverge. It is a scene in which the philosopher and the unlettered man will be alike interested.

The perfection and convenience of the present Post Office arrangements in Great Britain, of which the London Post Office is the head, cannot be fully described. A letter may be sent from one part of the kingdom to any other part for one penny, or about two cents. This money, instead of being paid at the office on the despatch or receipt of a letter, is paid for stamps, which are sold by stationers and others licensed for the purpose, in every city or village in the country. These stamps are usually square pieces of paper, covering not more space than a quarter of a dollar, and presenting a picture of the queen's face, with the words, "Postage one penny." They are printed on large sheets, and sold in quantities to suit purchasers. Those who have occasion to use them often, generally carry them in their pocket-books, as they would carry post-office change. One side of the sheet is covered over with an adhesive substance, so that it is only necessary to cut out a stamp, moisten the back of it with the finger, stick it upon the letter, and the postage is paid. It may then be dropped into any of the receiving offices which are scattered over all the large towns, and within an hour it will be on its journey to the place of destination. When it reaches the office to which it is directed, a carrier immediately takes it to the person for whom it was designed, if his location is indicated—thus obviating all necessity to visit the office for one's self. The facility with which letters find a stranger is remarkable. Perhaps the first intimation such a person receives that he is known, may be by a letter left at his room. A New-Yorker in London will often receive letters within fourteen days from the time when they were sealed by his friends three thousand five hundred miles away.

These facilities of conveyance are not confined to letters; other matter may be forwarded by the mail, if the right number of stamps be placed upon it. On one occasion, a friend who was spending some days in the country, met with a plant which he wished to transfer to his own garden. It was accordingly enclosed in a wrapper, with the simple direction, "Be sure you set it out to-night;" two stamps were sufficient for the postage; and when he returned a few days afterward, it was in a flourishing condition. On another occasion, a friend left a handkerchief which he valued as a remembrancer some three hundred miles from his home. He wrote for it, and received it on the following day, at a cost of four stamps, worth less than eight cents. All letters or parcels weighing more than half an ounce, have to pay an extra charge for each additional half ounce. This has given rise to a curious invention for weighing letters. It is a pencil so arranged as to be made strictly a pair of steelyards—one part of the case serving as the yard, another as the weight, and a third as the hook to take hold of the letter. With this contrivance, no one need make mistakes as to the number of stamps necessary for his letter or parcel.

In London, letters are delivered in every section of the city six or eight times a day, and as frequently taken from the receiving offices. If, therefore, one has a word to say to a friend five miles distant from him, he may calculate as certainly at what time that word will reach his friend through the post, as he could if he were to send it by a special messenger. To accelerate the delivery of letters in distant parts of the metropolis, the postmen used to be conveyed in long light vehicles to the verge of their districts, so as to be fresh for their work when they arrived. Each accelerator would carry a dozen men with their bags—the man belonging to the nearest walk standing next to the door, ready to descend without occasioning any stoppage. Now, boys upon horseback, with their red coats and large portmanteau, may be seen at almost any time, hurrying to distant sections of the city with their paper messages. Indeed, every thing connected with the post is conducted with regularity and expedition which are altogether surprising. The system is probably the most perfect in the world, and it is impossible to estimate the benefit which through it has been conferred upon the nation.

For the Recorder.

TIME OF COMMENCING THE SABBATH.

I have seen in the 26th No. of the Sabbath Recorder, over the signature "W. S.," some notice taken of my reply to the report of the Committee appointed by the General Conference on the Time of Commencing the Sabbath. The writer, exulting in the victory which he thinks he has obtained, advises me to give the matter up; and it may be, that we had better both give it up, or dispute no farther, inasmuch as he has gained no credit for his courtesy—and if I should, in the course of the discussion, manifest any thing of a similar spirit, it may be attributed to its contagious character. However, I think I am entitled to this one reply, if it were only to correct misrepresentation, which evidently appears in the commencement of his remarks—whether from design or from the want of discernment, I shall not say.

W. S. labors earnestly to prove, that evening is uniformly used in the Bible to signify the close of the day, or commencement of night; hereby implying, that I was ignorant of this simple truth, which every child of seven years old ought to know, and which I never thought of controverting. No, indeed, for this is the truth which I designed to establish, since it is this that overturns his own theory. How inconsistent that evening should be the beginning of night and the beginning of the day also!

W. S., after so much effort to prove what every body knows, viz. that evening means the beginning of night, and morning the beginning of day, says it must necessarily be admitted that the use made of them in the first chapter of Genesis is an exception to the general rule. I see no necessity for any such exception; it is only the inconsistency of his theory that creates the necessity. Only just admit that there was a day before there was a night, or in other words, that the night following the day belongs to it in the order of nature, and no such necessity will exist.

W. S. says, how I should conceive that the light part of the first day should precede the dark part of the same, is to him mysterious. It would seem, then, that there is one thing he cannot exactly account for with all his wisdom. Well, I will tell him, viz. that there was neither day nor night until God divided the light from the darkness, and called the light day, and the darkness night.

W. S. thinks that every man must know, that before there was light on this earth it certainly was dark, and that darkness was earth's first night. Here he differs from the committee; for although they say that night preceded the day, they add, "By this we do not mean to speak of that absolute darkness which rested upon the deep before God began to model chaos into form, as being the night which preceded the first day." I agree with the committee in this, that the darkness which rested upon the face of the deep was never called night; but I differ from them in this, that the first night preceded the first day. I believe, that the darkness which immediately followed the first day was that which God called night. There can be no conceivable objection to this on account of the night being subsequent to the naming of it. It will certainly be admitted, that God knows the end from the beginning. The notion of night preceding day in the order of nature is taken almost exclusivly from the manner of expression in Genesis first, "the evening and morning," and I think I have shown conclusively in my former remarks in reply to the Committee, that the meaning is substantially the same as if it had said, the morning and evening was the first day.

But, says W. S., the Scripture expressly says, "from even to even shall ye celebrate your Sabbaths." Now let us notice the connection in which these words stand, this was a peculiar occasion; it was the anniversary fast of atonement, when the whole nation of Israel were required to keep a solemn fast, to afflict their souls for sin. But the chief solemnities consisted in those rites by which the high-priest was to make atonement for the sins of the nation—which rites were never performed on any other occasion. It was an annual solemnity, as may be seen in the 16th chapter of Leviticus. This has nothing to do with the Sabbath of the fourth commandment, or the weekly Sabbath, inasmuch as the same rites were never performed, or the same orders given on any other occasion.

In reply to what W. S. has said about Nehemiah, I shall be short, seeing that it is principally based upon supposition and assertion. I shall only notice the question which he asks. He says, supposing that I (alluding to me) could give reasons why Nehemiah ordered the gates of Jerusalem shut in the evening, or when it began to be dark before the Sabbath independent of his believing that the Sabbath begun at sunset, what would that do towards proving that he did not believe it? I answer, that it would prove that there are reasons sufficiently weighty to warrant the course that he took, aside from his believing this, and hence there is no difficulty in construing the conduct of Nehemiah in this matter, for it does not follow as a necessary consequence from any thing that he said or did, that the Sabbath began at sunset.

W. S. comes now to reply to my remark on Matthew 28: 1. Before I enter upon this, I must premise a few things. I have been of the opinion that the use of discussion was to endeavor to obtain and diffuse light on different subjects. But, where a man shows evidently, by his dogmatical style, that he considers himself the standard of orthodoxy, and that it is a sufficient reason that any person is wrong, if he differs from him in his understanding of the Scriptures; nay, more, if the Scripture itself does not comport with his theory, it is by him pronounced vague; with such an one, there is little use in arguing. For the sake, however, of those who may read, I will make some remarks upon the testimony of the evangelists concerning the resurrection of Christ. This is a fundamental doctrine of the Christian religion; for if Christ be not risen, our faith and hope is all vain. Infidels, aware of this truth, in their attempts to overthrow the Christian religion, have assailed this doctrine with all their power, and have tried to make much out of what they call the contradictory testimony of the different evangelists; and I am sorry to find one professing Christianity showing them any countenance. Charles Bonnet, in his Philosophical and Critical Inquiries concerning Christianity, speaks of the little circumstantial difference in the testimony of the evangelists, as an evidence that they were honest, independent witnesses. If they had been designing men, wishing to impose a fraud upon the people, they would have been careful not to vary from each other in the least. Hence he says, that they agree essentially, with some circumstantial variation, which is always considered in courts of justice to strengthen testimony. Now let us come to the passage which has so much vagueness about it in the estimation of W. S. "In the end of the Sabbath, as it began to dawn towards the first day of the week, came Mary," &c. Let us see if there is so much contradiction between Matthew and the other evangelists. Mark says, "Very early in the morning of the first day of the week, they came unto the sepulchre at the rising of the sun." Luke says, "The women which followed our deceased Lord to the sepulchre, and saw where he was laid, returned and prepared spices and ointments, and rested the Sabbath according to the commandment; and upon the first day of the week, early in the morning, they came unto the sepulchre bringing the spices," &c. Aye, but the two last-mentioned witnesses, say you, differ essentially from the first. I say not. How much difference can you make between the close of one day and the beginning of another? Can you make a hair's breadth? I say, then, that there is nothing in the account of Mark or Luke that operates against Matthew's testimony. Neither do I believe there is any thing in John's, more than might naturally arise from locality. In summing up what the evangelists say, this is the amount—that in the end of the Sabbath, or about the commencement of the first day of the week, the women came to the sepulchre. If the translators of our Scriptures had any temptation to give a wrong coloring, it would be to bend as much as possible to the side of my opponent; for if the night preceding the Sabbath belonged to its consecrated hours, they will say he rose upon the first day of the week; but if the night following the Sabbath belonged to it and is a part of it, then he rose from the dead on the Sabbath; and this might be the reason why the translators were so puzzled with Matthew's account, if puzzled they were. But I think that some of our moderns have been more puzzled with it when they have been driven to the necessity, in order to get along with that text, to call it a vague expression! Now it cannot be otherwise than that Matthew's is express testimony in favor of my position. W. S. has in substance acknowledged it, by the unwarrantable shifts he has been obliged to make to evade its force.

We next come to John 20: 19, "The same day at evening, being the first day of the week," &c. I shall take but a passing notice of this, as I consider his argument a mere quibble. I have seen such kind of frothy arguments in debates on baptism, but they always put me in mind of the old adage, that 'a drowning man will catch at straws.' If he had been disputing with a first day keeper, who would have cited him to the two meetings of the disciples mentioned in this chapter as apostolic example for keeping the first day, I have no doubt that he would have rebutted his argument by saying, that they were not first day meetings; it was evening, after sunset, most probably after dark; they were afraid of the Jews; therefore they would be likely to hold their meetings in the night. Such have been the arguments of some of his brethren, I know; and I think that W. S. has argued thus himself heretofore. But on this occasion it does not suit his purpose. I could bring several other texts of similar import; but it would be of no use, as far as W. S. is concerned, for he thinks he has clearly and positively proved that the Sabbath begins at sunset without bringing a solitary text directly in point.

But it would seem that his principal dependence is placed upon the practice of the Jews. Therefore I shall notice what he has said upon Mark 1: 32, in connection with what he calls "living testimony." He says, "that the Jews, even in the days of their greatest wickedness, were extremely tenacious about the Sabbath day." This is a sweeping assertion, and one which I think it will be difficult to sustain. Read their history during the reign of Menassah, when the Lord testified of them that they had done worse than the heathen whom he drove out before them. So wholly were they given up to idolatry as a people, that the book of the law of the Lord was by them wholly neglected, as may be seen in the 33d and 34th chapters of 2d Chronicles. And the Lord, by the prophet Ezekiel, 20th chapter, says of Israel, "that they had despised his judgments, and not walked in his statutes, but had polluted his Sabbath, for their hearts went after their idols." Is it probable, that during this and many other stages of their history, they were as a people, so extremely tenacious of the Sabbath day? If this had been the case, there would have been one redeeming quality in their character. Could it have been said of them, in that case, that they had done worse than the heathen in their idolatrous profanity. Now, continues W. S., "if any man wishes to know when the Sabbath begins and ends, he has only to find out how the Jews keep it, and if he keeps it in this respect as they do, he may be sure that he is right." This is rather singular doctrine even on the supposition that it is true. I have always thought that the Bible, and the Bible only, was the religion of Protestants, instead of placing implicit confidence in any body of men calling themselves infallible, whether Jews or Romanists. I think this looks like that little horn of which he speaks, for observe, he says that in this matter we need only go to the Jews to know the truth a people whom Christ has said were blind guides, and has reiterated his woes upon them. Seven times in one chapter, he pronounces them fools and blind. Read the 23d chapter of Matthew, and also the 7th chapter of Mark. When conversing with the Pharisees, he says, "In vain do ye worship me, teaching for doctrine the commandments of men, for laying aside the commandments of God, ye hold the traditions of men." And he further says, "Full well ye reject the commandments of God that ye may keep your own traditions." He charges them with "making the word of God of none effect by their traditions; and many such like things ye do." So that it is evident that they were more tenacious of their own traditions, than they were of the commands of God. I must say, for myself, I would not keep the seventh day as a Sabbath if I had no better authority for it than because the Jews keep it. I believe that the Scripture is the more sure word of prophecy, the only infallible guide for our faith and practice, and the Saviour's example the only perfect model for our imitation. To say that the Jews have never deviated in the least with respect to the time of commencing the Sabbath is asserting more than any one knows. But admitting, as I do, that the Jews observe the right day for the Sabbath, can it be proved that they have never changed the time of its commencement by their traditions since God gave the law from mount Sinai? Can W. S. prove what he has asserted, that precisely as they understood it then, so they understand it now. I believe that the inspired men who wrote the Gospels knew as well about that as W. S. I have as good authority for saying that this tenacity for sixth-day-night keeping had its origin in Jewish tradition, as he has for saying that the Marys went twice to the sepulchre, and that they were driven away by the watch.

I shall only say, in conclusion, that unless I alter my mind, this is the last reply that I shall make to W. S., even if he should call me Beelzebub.

FAGANUS.

January 12, 1845.

☞ The publication of the foregoing is due to the writer. His first article, in reply to the Report of the Committee, we regarded as a candid statement of his reasons for not subscribing to that Report; and we were quite disposed to drop the matter there, leaving the Report and the Reply to exert their natural influence upon the minds of the readers. But when we received the article of W. S., we were anxious to give free scope to inquiry, and therefore published it, although it contained some remarks perhaps unnecessarily severe. The present article is in answer; and since it is announced as the last one from that source, we presume it will end the discussion, unless there is something special to say in reply. If there is anything special, we hope it will be said with brevity and without personal allusions.

[ED. REC.

THE REFORMATION.—When I call to mind, (says Milton) that at last, after so many dark ages, wherein the huge over-shadowing train of error had almost swept all the stars out of the firmament of the church—how the bright and blissful Reformation, by divine power, struck through the black and settled night of ignorance and anti-Christian tyranny—methinks a sovereign and reviving joy must needs rush into the bosom of him that reads and hears, and the sweet odor of the returning gospel imbathe his soul with the fragrancy of heaven.

THE HOLY LAND.

We are indebted to a letter written by a missionary of the London Jews' Society, for the following picture of the state of things in the Holy Land:—

The state of things in this country is daily becoming more intensely interesting. If we pass through the land, a strange picture presents itself; a decreasing population, deserted or ruined villages, a stand to all improvements; no one thinks of planting a tree, or looking beyond present wants. In the city a similar spirit prevails—no permanent improvement any where carried on, the minds of the people appear to be unstrung, the whole country unsettled; the population divided into parties, influenced by the keenest hostility; sometimes coming into contact, at other times reined in, as if by some invisible power. Very lately, several conflicts ensued, and many lives were lost and villages plundered.

Men of the world look on this state of things with much perplexity, and many a conjecture is hazarded as to what may be the result; but the student of prophecy reads in this apparent confusion and conflict of moral elements, the secret touches of that Hand which guides and controls the destinies of nations, and makes even the sceptres of the world to bend to His purposes. It is true this state of things has its inconveniences, and, in some instances, may even obstruct the work of missions; but in reference to this land, in an especial manner, we are persuaded that in proportion as the political horizon darkens, the prophetical horizon brightens.

PROPHECY.

Prophecy furnishes an argument in favor of Christianity, the force of which is continually growing. The argument began, when first a single prophecy was fulfilled. It increased more and more, as prediction and fulfillment multiplied. In the age of the apostles, it was a powerful as well as a favorite weapon in proof of the Gospel. But during that period, many new predictions were published, and many ancient ones remained to be accomplished. The argument, consequently, was not yet at its height. It has been growing ever since, as one century after another has rolled out an additional fulfillment, or completed and enlarged those already advanced. We, in the present age, enjoy an expanse and variety and completeness of prophetic evidence, far exceeding those which the chart of history presented to St. Paul. There is to us a voice from the silent solitudes where Babylon and Tyre once stood in pride and reigned in power; from the modern history of prostrate Egypt; from the wonderful annals and present condition of the Jewish race; from the desolate state of the holy land and adjoining countries; from the rise and present aspect of the mystic Babylon—which the primitive Christians had not the privilege of hearing. The force of this argument is yet to grow continually. A few years hence, in all probability, will exhibit it invested with a brightness and glory, compared with which all present evidence will seem but as morning twilight. The end of the world will be its full maturity. Prophecy having begun with the history of sin, extends to the completion of its tragedy; and not till the blazing of the great conflagration, when "the earth and all that is therein shall be burned up," will its every prediction be fulfilled, or the fulness of glory with which it was designed to show the truth of God in the Gospel of his son, be made to appear.

[McIlvaine's Ev. of Christianity.

A NEGLECTED NEW TESTAMENT.

The following account, copied from the "Quarterly of the Foreign Evangelical Society," may serve to illustrate these words of Scripture, "Cast thy bread on the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days."

"In a small town in the eastern part of France, three or four years ago, a shopkeeper bought of a colporteur, employed by our society, a New Testament. But he was not a lover of God's word, and did not read the book he had purchased, and it was forgotten in a corner of his house. Several months had elapsed, when a sister of his, who lived in a village in the district of B——, came to see him. She found the Testament covered with dust, opened it, and asked her brother, 'What book is this?'

"'It is a book I bought of a colporteur, but I don't read it.'

"'But it is the New Testament,' she replied.

"'Yes,' he answered, 'but it is a Protestant book, and I don't care for it.'

"'Well,' said the sister, 'if you don't care for it, give it to me, I will carry it home, and read it very willingly.'

"The woman took the book, she read it, and became converted, without having heard or known any servant of Christ. Soon after this, her husband and her own son were brought to the knowledge of the salvation that is in Jesus Christ. Their conversion was followed by that of a cousin of theirs, and lastly, by that of the very man who had purchased the word of God, and despised it, for himself. All these Christians are now bearing their cross faithfully, and may be considered as the first fruits of their country for Christ."

In the Jews' Cemetery, at Prague, a tomb is pointed out, erected in the last century, to the memory of a wealthy and benevolent Israelite. Meissel—for that was the name he bore—had no inheritance from his father; he lived in the same modest and parsimonious manner as the majority of his nation, and continued till death to be a dealer in old iron. But—he built the Jewish Council-house at Prague, erected four synagogues, paved six streets, and fed every week sixty poor people! Truly did Meissel's old iron yield greater advantages to others, and doubtless greater satisfaction to himself, than all the silver and gold, houses and lands, of many a wealthy possessor, who calls himself a Christian.

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENTS.

The January number of the Christian Examiner, an able review published at Boston, contains an article on Christian Festivals, founded upon the great German work of Dr. Augusti, in which it is asserted, that "the first day of the week was never even CALLED 'the Sabbath' until the sixteenth century, the early Fathers all meaning Saturday when they speak of the Sabbath." This assertion, made upon such high authority, has called forth from some of the secular papers expressions of great surprise. The doctrine that the first day of the week was substituted for the seventh by Christ and the Apostles, and that the early Christians kept it as the Sabbath, has been so frequently and earnestly maintained by good men, that the suggestion of a doubt upon that point excites suspicion, and a direct denial is regarded with astonishment. But there is no good reason why it should be so. In the discussions of the subject soon after the Reformation, both in Germany and England, it was acknowledged by the best scholars and historians to be a new doctrine, that the first day of the week was the Sabbath and might be called by that name. It had previous to that time been regarded as a festival of the church, and ranked among others which are now rejected by all good Protestants. Several large and learned books were written upon the subject, in which this view was advocated, and neither of those books was ever satisfactorily answered. When, however, Puritanism was transplanted to this country, it taught the new doctrine of a Sunday Sabbath with so much zeal that the notion was generally received. Hence most of our leading theologians have asserted the divine appointment of Sunday for the Sabbath with a positiveness which has not been exceeded by their assertions upon any other point, however plainly revealed. Hence those who hold a different view have often been treated with neglect and classed among the worst of errorists.

But in this case, as in many others, over-action has produced a re-action. Proof of it is seen in the discussion which is going on in Germany, where the great mass of scholars deny the divine appointment of the first day of the week for a Sabbath, asserting that either we have no divinely-appointed Sabbath, or else the seventh day of the week must be the day. It is seen in the fact that the same position has been taken by many in England, who have opposed the recent Agnew movement to secure laws for the stricter observance of Sunday in that country. It is seen in the historical articles on the subject which have appeared within a short time past in some influential religious journals in our own country. It is useless to close our eyes upon these facts, and it is equally useless to attempt to evade the conclusion, that they result to a considerable extent from the unwarrantable efforts to force upon men that for which no divine authority is brought, and for which, therefore, they can not justly be expected to cherish any deep respect and veneration.

These new developments will be regarded with very different feelings by different men. By a large class of persons, they will be looked upon with pain, as indicating a sad departure from the wholesome belief of our fathers. Such persons would prefer that the mass of the Christian community should remain in ignorance of these historical facts, lest a knowledge of them should remove some of the restraints which are now in force. With such feelings we have no sympathy; nor do we see how any one who has a sincere love for the truth can delibrate for a moment as to the expediency of encouraging such misapprehensions. It appears to us like one of the ways of doing evil that good may come—a course which the apostle connects with damnation. If it is necessary to conceal the truth, or even to withhold it, in order to support a favorite theory, the sooner that theory is exploded the better. Whatever apparent benefits such a course might promise, they would be purchased at too high a price, if those whose duty it is to bear witness to the truth must connive at interpretations and representations which change the truth into a lie. Neither charity nor expediency require any such thing. Real charity rejoices in the truth, and real expediency is to conform to it. Instead, therefore, of lamenting the historical developments to which we have referred, they should be regarded with satisfaction, as among the instrumentalities by which the true doctrine of the Sabbath is finally to be placed upon a sure foundation.

THE DAY OF FASTING AND PRAYER.

We have received from several places short accounts of the manner in which the day of fasting and prayer appointed by the General Conference was observed. The following will interest our readers:—

NATHAN V. HULL writes from Clarence: "Eld. Andrus delivered an excellent sermon for the occasion. The exercises of the day were of a highly interesting character. A large number of our first day friends came in to behold 'our order,' many of whom seemed interested. The exercises were solemn and deeply affecting. Our alms were sanctified by our prayers, and our tears testified to the sincerity of our hearts. A number present who have never observed the Sabbath were melted into tenderness, and have since acknowledged their conviction of the justness of our cause."

WM. B. MAXSON writes from Brookfield: "The season was observed by a considerable number of the church, and the meeting was attended by some of our first day friends. In connection with other exercises, the object of the meeting was explained, and the claims of the Sabbath were vindicated to some extent. But light is not so much heeded here as a disposition to walk in it. People are very ready to admit that the seventh day is the only Sabbath, and I think if they had enough of the right kind of religion, they would not satisfy themselves with merely admitting this truth."

Similar meetings were held in other places, at which not only were the claims of the Sabbath presented and made a subject of prayer, but contributions were taken for the purpose of circulating the truth in regard to those claims. The Treasurer of the General Tract Society has received encouraging remittances as the result of those meetings, which will be acknowledged in due time.

SOUTH CAROLINA LEGISLATION.

Prompted by the recent mission of Mr. Hoar, and for the purpose of excluding all such agents from the State hereafter, the Legislature of S. C. has passed an act, making it a crime for any person, on his own behalf or on behalf of anybody else, to visit that State to hinder the operation of its laws relating to slaves or free colored persons; or for any person in the State to accept a commission from any authority without the State in relation to slaves or free persons of color, and to do anything which shall disturb the operation of the laws relative to such persons. The penalty for the first crime, is a fine not exceeding $1000, and imprisonment for one year; for the second, a fine and imprisonment for seven years. Power is given to the Governor to require any person visiting the State on such an errand to leave within forty-eight hours after notice is given, or become liable to fine and imprisonment. Such laws are an instructive commentary upon the system which they are designed to protect. They show that when the rights of free citizens of the Union come into conflict with the interests of slavery, those rights must be sacrificed.

MASSACHUSETTS AND LOUISIANA.

There is every prospect of a difficulty between these States, similar to that between Massachusetts and South Carolina. It seems that a Mr. Hubbard was sent to New Orleans by the authorities of Massachusetts to collect and transmit accurate information respecting the number and names of citizens of Massachusetts, who have been imprisoned without the allegation of any crime. In consequence of this, a Message was on the 7th inst., sent to the Legislature of Louisiana by the Governor, full of expressions of indignation at what he calls a daring assumption of interference on the part of one State. After the reading of the Message in the House of Representatives, a member presented a full statement of grievances, to which was appended an act making it a crime to visit Louisiana for any such purpose, the punishment to be a fine and hard labor in the Penitentiary for several years. The rules of the House were suspended to read the act, which was referred to a committee, together with the Message of the Governor and other documents. From this it is apparent, that Louisiana is anxious to disgrace herself by following in the footsteps of South Carolina. It is said that Mr. Hubbard has left New Orleans.

THE ANTI-CHRISTIAN PRESS.—In the January number of the Missionary Herald, the remarkable fact is stated, that in India there are several newspapers published for the express purpose of opposing Christianity. Three of them are published weekly in the Mahratta language, and one monthly in the Goozerattee language. Besides these, there are three ordinary newspapers published in the Goozerattee language, and two in the Persian. The Mahommedans also have had a paper till lately, but it is now discontinued. These papers are said to exert great influence among the natives; and perhaps there are no greater obstacles to the spread of Christianity in those countries than they present. With a view to counteract their influence in part, the Bombay Witness was established, which is said to be an evangelical and attractive paper.

ENCOURAGEMENT.—Nothing can more encourage those who are embarked in a religious enterprise, than evidence that they have the sympathy of their co-workers. This evidence will often quicken them in the discharge of their duties, and enable them to bear up under many things which would otherwise be disheartening. To such encouragement—thanks to our friends—we are not wholly strangers. Many letters which we have received within a month past, have been most welcome. May their writers be doubly blessed for the labor they have already performed, and that which they promise in future.

THE TRUE WESLEYAN.—In our last reply to the editor of the Wesleyan, the question is raised, whether his first article, in which his position should have been distinctly stated, was not designed, by saying a great many irrelevant things, to leave an impression that something had been said to the point? In raising that question, we wished to call attention to the natural effect of the article, rather than to the intentions of the editor. Probably the word adapted would have expressed our meaning better than the word designed, and would have been in every respect less objectionable.

EPISCOPAL SEMINARY.—The court of inqury respecting the supposed heretical notions of certain students in the General Seminary of the Episcopal Church, resulted in the dismissal of two students, the suspension of one, and the reprimanding of another. The precise charges against them are not distinctly stated. There were rumors of correspondence on the part of some students with leading Roman Catholics, and also that Rome had actually secured a candidate or two for the priesthood in the very bosom of this Protestant Seminary. Whether these rumors were well founded or not, it seems that the accused students defended their peculiar notions before the court with considerable zeal and even undertook to show, that the views they entertained, however Romish they might be considered, were yet in strict accordance with the articles and ordinal of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Central Association held its Semi-Annual Meeting with the 3d Church in Brookfield, on the 7th and 8th days of January, 1845. The business appropriated to this meeting of the Association was to hear the reports of Missionaries, receive the contributions of the Churches, and devise ways and means for future operations. The bad state of the roads prevented so full a representation of the churches as there otherwise probably would have been. Yet the deliberations were harmonious, and manifested an increased and growing zeal in the cause of missions, and other interests connected with the well-being of the churches.

The report of laborers showed, that Elder E. S. Bailey had labored under the direction of the Association 25 days, for which he was allowed $10 68 cts.; that Elder James Bailey had labored 25 days, for which he was allowed the like sum of $10 68 cts.; and that Eld. Varnum Hull had labored 7 days, for which he was allowed $2 99; these sums being the amount of funds in the treasury, after defraying incidental expenses. It was then

Resolved, That in view of the importance of the station in Richland and vicinity, and the interest manifested there on the subject of the Sabbath, we appoint Elds. Eli S. Bailey and James Bailey to labor on that station so much of the time as shall be deemed necessary to keep up the good work already begun; and that Eld. Varnum Hull be appointed to the Otselic and Smyrna station.

Resolved, That Eli S. Bailey, Giles M. Langworthy, and James Bailey, be a committee to prepare a Tract on the subject of Baptism, and report at the next annual session of the Association.

Resolved, That Eli S. Bailey, Giles M. Langworthy, Varnum Hull, James Bailey, A. L. Saunders, Samuel B. Crandal, Charles M. Lewis, Russel G. Burdick, Ephraim Maxson, Joel Greene, Elias Burdick, Wm. Greene, Joshua Clarke, Clarke Rogers, John J. Maxson, Charles Potter, Nathan Saunders, be our delegates to attend any Sabbath Convention that may be held within the bounds of this Association previous to the next annual session.

Resolved, That the reports of missionaries, and so much of the Minutes as may be deemed of particular interest, be published in the Sabbath Recorder; and that the Minutes at length be reserved on file for publication with the Minutes of the Annual Session of the Association.

Resolved, That Ephraim Maxson and A. L. Saunders be a committee to prepare the Minutes for the press.

GILES M. LANGWORTHY, Secretary.

REPORTS OF MISSIONARIES.

ELD. VARNUM HULL reported, that agreeably to the appointment of the Association, he visited Otselic, N. Y., in the latter part of June, where he had much conversation with the people upon the subject of the Sabbath and religious subjects in general; and preached to a large concourse of hearers, among whom much interest was apparent. He then went to Boil's Settlement, preached in the afternoon, held religious conversation with several persons, and distributed some Sabbath publications. Four weeks afterward, he fulfilled another appointment in Otselic, when considerable interest was manifested both among backsliders and non-professors. He also preached at Smyrna to a large and attentive assembly—so large that the house was not sufficient to contain them all. Having left an appointment for that purpose, he visited them again after four weeks, accompanied by Eld. Estee, who preached on the subject of the Sabbath, and distributed publications, many manifesting an interest in the subject. In conclusion, he speaks of the anxiety to read and hear on that subject, and urges the duty of continuing to occupy the field.

ELD. JAMES BAILEY presented the following report of his labors:—

In compliance with my appointment at your last session, I made four visits to Otselic and Smyrna, and preached seven discourses. The meetings were well attended, and an apparently deep interest was felt by the congregations. Considerable interest had been excited by Eld. V. Hull, on the subject of the Sabbath, and some with whom I conversed, acknowledged the correctness of our sentiments, but did not adopt them in practice on account of their supposed inconvenience. There was but little open opposition to the introduction of our sentiments; but great pains were taken privately to prejudice our cause.

In the early part of October, I visited Richland and vicinity. When I arrived, I learned that five persons had lately embraced the Bible Sabbath, one of whom was Eld. Elias Burdick, a respectable minister of the Baptist denomination. The next day after I arrived, (being Sabbath,) I met with the few Sabbath-keepers, heard Eld. B. preach in the afternoon, and preached in the evening. There being much excitement on the subject of the Sabbath, I was requested to lecture upon it the next evening, which I did to a large and very attentive congregation. At the close of the lecture, I distributed several sets of Sabbath Tracts, with which I had provided myself. There seemed to be an eagerness to investigate the subject. On fourth day evening I lectured again on the same subject, near Fort Ontario, where the same spirit was manifested. I spent most of the week in visiting from house to house, and made it my principal business to present the claims of the Bible Sabbath. Most with whom I conversed, expressed a conviction that our sentiments were right. Some thought they would embrace them, others wished to examine further. I met with no particular opposition, though it was intimated that some of the ministers would be likely to oppose me. During the week I was invited to supply the desk of the Baptist Meeting House at Holmesville—their minister being absent. I accordingly repaired there at an early hour, and learned before time to commence the exercises, that they would be glad to have me preach, if I would "let that subject alone," meaning the Sabbath. At the close of the second exercise, I made an appointment to lecture on "that subject," at the school-house, that evening. At evening the house was literally jammed. Not being able to finish the subject that evening, I adjourned it to the next evening, with the request that if there was any part of the subject that any of them wished light upon, they should present it previous to the lecture the next evening. When the evening arrived, the only point presented was the matter contained in the 31st. chap. of Exodus, relative to the Sabbath being a sign between God and the children of Israel. I lectured about two hours that evening, and closed with the request, that if any were not satisfied with the arguments, they would state their objections. But there were none presented. I afterwards learned, that they almost unanimously considered our views unanswerable.

The next eveving but one I was requested to lecture on the same subject at a place called "the Woods." At the close of my lecture, a Methodist minister raised the objection, that if the seventh-day is kept as a Sabbath, it must be commenced Friday at noon, at which time he asserted the Jews commenced their Sabbath, as shown by history. On being pressed to present the history, he said that he did not know that he could get it, but a Mr. West, of Pulaski, had it. I then offered him my horse to go after it, if he would present it the next evening but one, at which time I was to finish the subject. But when the evening came he presented himself without the history. At the close of my second lecture, the objection was raised, that we could not be right, because we were so few; also, that preaching our doctrines killed the spirit of religion. These objections were answered and the meeting dismissed. The same spirit of inquiry was manifest here as in other places where I had lectured, and the same eagerness to obtain our publications.

The next first day I lectured on the same subject in Albion, near the residence of Eld. B. There were two Methodist ministers present from Pulaski, and one from some other place. At the close of my lecture, I requested any that were not satisfied that our sentiments were right, to state their objections, or if any one wished to ask any questions touching the subject, that they then should do so. The two ministers from Pulaski left the house, one before I closed, the other immediatley after. The one who remained arose and said that I had stated that "Christ arose on the first day of the week, and he would prove from the Scriptures that he did not." He then quoted the words of Christ, that he would be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth; and also stated that the Scriptures informed us that he was interred sixth day afternoon; consequently, it must be later than the next first day that he arose. To which I replied, that I had admitted that he arose on that day for the argument's sake, though I really doubted it. This I mention to show, to what inconsistencies and contradictions first-day ministers resort, to sustain their Sunday keeping. The congregation were very attentive, and seemed much inclined to investigate. They very quickly divested me of the last of five dollars worth of Sabbath publications that I took with me.

During the time I was there, six persons commenced keeping the Sabbath, and several more expressed their conviction that we were right, but were not ready yet to come over. At the close of my labors there, there were fifteen Sabbath keepers, and we talked of organizing a church; but as these were not all perfectly agreed in sentiments, it was thought best to defer it a few weeks.

Almost all that I met, seemed willing to examine the subject, and promised to act in accordance with their convictions. The clergy of the vicinity did nothing more than exert a private influence over their members. It was thought that as soon as I should leave, they would commence lecturing. Arrangements were accordingly made, that if they should do so, and offer discussion, to accept their offer. At the close of my labor there was a wide spread and wide spreading excitement on the Sabbath question; so much so, that all the ministers could not stop it. The people wanted light, and were disposed to seek it. Men of high standing in society, and some of the main pillars of the Baptist Church seemed just on the poise, who, with proper efforts, would be brought out on the side of truth. If their rulers should believe, the multitude would follow in their wake. The Sabbath keepers there were extremely anxious to have further labors. I felt safe in encouraging them that the field should be occupied, and the excitement be followed up, however far it might extend itself, despite the wishes and efforts of Sunday sanctifiers.

Eld. ELI S. BAILEY reported as follows:—

Having been appointed by the Central Seventh-day Baptist Association, to labor as a missionary in Newport and vicinity, and Richland and vicinity, I left home about the last of October, and visited Newport. I tarried with the brethren a number of days, preached four times, made a number of family visits, and baptized one person, who united with the church. In returning, I had the misfortune to break down my wagon, and received a considerable hurt.

Again, I left home on the 18th of December, for Richland, and arrived at brother Chas. M. Lewis', in Verona, on the same evening, and in company with brother Lewis, went to New-London, and heard Rev. H. Mattison of the Methodist Church, lecture on the subject of the Sabbath. He labored to prove that the present first day was the creation seventh day. Among his proofs, was the celebrated astronomical calculation of Rev. Billy Hibbard. His effort on this point was a total failure. He merely begged the question he ought to have proved. In his concluding remarks, he addressed the Seventh-day Baptists, stating that by their own confession, first-day keeping was not a damning sin; therefore he exhorted them to disband and unite with first-day churches. The next morning, I left for Richland, with an understanding that I would reply to Rev. Mr. Mattison's discourse, on my return. I arrived at Richland the same day, at evening, and put up with a first-day Baptist, he being an old acquaintance. The next day I went to a brother Hubbard's, at Galespy's Mills. I found the public mind much exercised on the subject of the Sabbath. Many were examining the subject, and embracing every facility for obtaining information. I was frequently called upon to give my reasons for keeping the seventh day, and was listened to with deep interest, seldom meeting with any opposition whatever. The excitement had continued for a number of months, and was continually increasing in its extent. Numbers had already embraced the seventh day Sabbath. During my stay in Richland and vicinity, I labored incessantly, both by public preaching and family visiting. On the first first-day after my arrival, I attended a public lecture in favor of first-day keeping, by Rev. Mr. Hapgood, principal of Mexicoville Academy. He reviewed the Seventh-day Baptists' "Sabbath Tracts," and attempted to prove the sanctity of first day. He relied principally on the testimony of the "Fathers" to establish his position. He labored something like two hours and a half, and then gave way, when it was announced by a first day man, that I would lecture on the same subject in the evening, at the same place. Brother Hapgood insisted that he ought to have the privilege of replying to my arguments, and requested that my lecture should take place at 3 o'clock, which would give me but one hour to obtain refreshments, and to prepare for the lecture. I replied, that I was entirely willing that he should reply to me, and that he should have the closing plea; but I wanted more time than his proposal would afford me. I offered to meet him in public debate and discuss the subject till he was satisfied. Without accepting my proposal, he then requested me to commence my lecture at 5 o'clock, and let him reply to me the same evening. To this I replied, that he might have the whole evening if he chose; otherwise I must have it. In the evening, at an early hour, the house was filled to overflowing. I spoke about as long as brother Hapgood did in the day time, and at the close repeated the offer to meet brother Hapgood in public debate, which was not accepted. During my lecture, brother Hapgood frequently rose to explain, but treated me kindly. I am satisfied, from my own observation, as well as from the expressions of others, that brother Hapgood's lecture did more to convince the people of the correctness of our sentiments than any thing that I did or could say. During my stay, one entire family, the husband in another, and the wife in another, all embraced the Sabbath with a strong probability that the rest would soon follow. As a general thing, those who embraced the Sabbath during my stay were advocates of a mixed communion. Of course I was called on to discuss that subject, and although they professed to be strong in their convictions, yet I soon found their prejudices gradually giving way, and their minds yielding to the force of truth. On the last day of my stay in Richland, a Seventh-day Baptist church was organized, which was received into the fellowship of the Seventh-day Baptist connection, by a council consisting of four brethren from the church at Adams and myself. There is a fair prospect of a number more uniting with them soon. Their request to the Association for further missionary aid, is strong and pressing, and my ardent desire is, that the Association may respond to their petition. I left Richland on sixth-day morning, and traveled in a pelting storm about forty-five miles to Verona, where I arrived at evening much exhausted. The next day I met with the first church, preached to them in the day time, and at evening replied to Rev. Mr. Mattison's lecture on the Sabbath. The next day I met with the brethren, it being the day appointed by the General Conference as a day of fasting and prayer. The day following I returned home.

REVIVALS.—At Sag Harbor, L. I., an interesting revival has been in progress for some time past, in the course of which nearly one hundred persons have made profession of faith in Christ. Bro. Alfred B. Burdick, of Hopkinton, R. I., was engaged in preaching there for some time, from whose account we judge that a great change has taken place in the religious character of that community. In Michigan City, Ind., likewise, we learn that upwards of sixty have lately been led from the error of their ways, and brought to confess Christ.

MORE ANNEXATION.—Petitions are extensively circulating in Michigan for the annexation of Canada to the United States, provided that Texas is annexed. It is said in favor of this course, that there are natives of the United States in Canada, as well as in Texas; and that the project of annexing Canada ought to receive the support of those who argue in favor of the annexation of Texas, because "it will enlarge the area of human freedom." The reasons set forth for this measure are two-fold. First, that the addition of Texas to the South demands the addition of Canada to the North, in order to preserve the just balance and equipoise of the Union. Second, that Canada is in itself a most desirable acquisition for the United States, with a view both to military defence and to commercial intercourse.

THOMAS W. DORR.—The Legislature of Rhode Island has passed an act to liberate Thos. W. Dorr, on condition that he shall go before the Supreme Court and take the oath of allegiance to the State. The Warden of the Prison was empowered to inform the prisoner of the act, and if he signified his willingness to take the oath, to conduct him before the Court. The Court meets at Kingston on the 3d of February, and at Providence on the 14th of March.

CHAPELS FOR SEAMEN.—A new chapel for this long-neglected class of men, especially those connected with the naval station, was recently dedicated at Brooklyn, when several sailors in the service of the navy made a public profession of religion. The chapel has been fitted up by order of the Secretary of the Navy.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Nobody values a good communication more than an editor. When therefore he rejects an article altogether, or delays its publication till it can appear to the best advantage, he should be regarded as consulting the general good rather than his own feelings. Brief and pithy communications are always welcome both to editors and readers.

MISSIONARIES FOR CHINA.—The Rt. Rev. Bishop Boone, Missionary Bishop, Mrs. Boone and son, the Rev. Mr. Woods and wife, the Rev. Mr. Graham and wife; Miss Gillett, Miss Jones, and Miss Morse, with the Chinese teacher and attendant, embarked for China, from New York, on board the ship Horatio, Capt. Wood, on Saturday the 14th ult. Much interest has been manifested by our Church in the success of this mission; and going out as the missionaries now do, with a Bishop at their head, carrying the Church in its integrity, we may indulge the confident hope that their devoted labors will be abundantly blessed to the establishing the Church of the Redeemer in that very interesting and important field of missionary enterprise. EUROPEAN NEWS.

Several packets have arrived within a week, bringing intelligence to the 18th ult., being some days later than by the last steamer.

The cotton market remained unchanged, and money was said to be plenty.

The mammoth steamship Great Britain had made a trial trip and proved a fast sailer.

IRELAND was much agitated. O'Connel was in Dublin, and had been making tremendous speeches in favor of Repeal.

A great number of cases were landed at the London custom-house a few days ago, containing presents of great value from the Emperor of Russia to the Queen, Prince Albert, Sir R. Peel, the Dukes of Devonshire and Buccleuch, &c. Some superb malachite vases sent to the Queen are valued at £10,000.

The Morning Advertiser states that there are 18 or 20 staunch Puseyites in the House of Commons, ready to maintain that the Church ought to predominate over the State.

The Marquis of Londonderry is stated, in the Morning Post, to have expended upwards of "£80,000" in city of Durham election!

CAPTURE OF A SLAVER.—The Ferret, 19, Commander Oake, captured on the 26th September, a schooner with 405 slaves on board, six days out. She was without colors, papers or chart, having it is supposed been all thrown overboard. No person would acknowledge himself the captain, whom the crew reported, or even give her name, or say to whom she belonged, or where bound. It is believed her name is the Aventura, of 140 tons, belonging to Rio de Janeiro. At the time of capture the Ferret was on her passage to St. Paul de Leondo, distant about 250 miles.

Letters from Italy state that the continued shock of earthquakes by which, for more than a year past the city of Ragusa has been disturbed, have created so much alarm, that it is in contemplation to evacuate the well-known place, and build a new Ragusa on some better protected spot of the Dalmatic shore.

A letter from Leghorn, dated November 23d, states that a small number of Poles, coming for the most part from Algiers, embarked some days ago at that port for Smyrna, where they intended to go for the purpose of joining the Caucasian insurgents, to assist them with their military knowledge. They announced that they would be soon followed by many of their countrymen who were living in exile in England and Belgium.

The weather in England has been very severe, more so than for many years past.

At Liverpool, on the 17th ultimo, a public dinner was given to Sir Henry Pottinger.

The Bishop of Exeter has written a letter to his clergy, directing the wearing of the surplice, and other formalities, interpreted as being an enforcement of Puseyite peculiarities.

Travelers arrived at Constantinople about Nov. 20, from Persia, reported the arrival of Dr. Wolff at Meshed, in safety, although he had not yet reached Teheran.

Subsequent accounts from Trebizond of the 16th of November mentioned the safe arrival of Dr. Wolff at Teheran on his way to England.

Some idea may be formed of the financial power of Messrs. Rothschild's house, when it is known that at the beginning of this month it had in its possession 7,800,000 florins' worth of bills on discount.

The Emperor of Russia has issued a decree for a loan of twelve millions of silver rubles, for the construction of the railway between Moscow and St. Petersburg.

The Glasgow Post contains the following paragraph concerning Mr. Polk:

"The new President of the United States is of Scottish lineage; and his curious looking name is an abridgment of a good old Scotch one. Mr. Polk's father or grandfather is said to have been a Lanarkshire man of the name of Pollock. In the somewhat peculiar dialect of the upper ward of this county, that name is pronounced Poke, and hence, probably, the orthography adopted by the translantic branch of the family."

Letters from Switzerland, state that the movement in Lucerne had been put down, but that the country generally, was in a state of great excitement.

MORE PERSECUTION IN MADEIRA.—Several Persons Killed.—The Portuguese Island of Madeira—where the established religion is the Roman Catholic, none other being tolerated among the common people—has been the theater of unpleasant occurrences, owing to a desire of some of the population to become Protestants. A letter from that Island, of date 25th Nov., narrates the particulars of a conflict between the Protestant converts and the military, which had recently occurred. The Protestants were assailed early in November; while engaged in religious service, the police broke into the house, knocked down the man who was officiating in the service, and carried off four or five prisoners. The people having pursued them, released the prisoners, and captured the police, except one who escaped. The populace tied the hands and feet of the police, and left them on the road. An army of 350 men was then ordered out to put down the converts, and a fatal conflict ensued. Eight soldiers were killed, and a number of Protestants. A large number of the latter were taken prisoners, who are to be sent to Portugal to be tried as rebels. [Sun.

EPISCOPAL MISSIONS.—Dr. Perkins and Mr. Appleby, with their wives, have recently sailed for Africa, the former to be engaged in medical practice, the latter in conducting a printing press, in connection with Missionary labors.

The domestic Committee of the Episcopal Board of Missions have opened a separate account of contributions, which they denominate "The fund for the religious improvement of the colored population in our country, and especially in the Southern and South Western States." It is contemplated to raise up an efficient class of laborers, who may be ordained as deacons, and supported for $150 a year.

RELIGION IN IRELAND.—We learn that Bible Readers and Home Missionaries are laboring with animating success in Ireland. It is less than ten years since the first effort was there made to teach the Bible in schools; 400 schools came into the plan, and 342 teachers were employed the last year. It is estimated that 16,547 children have thus learned to read the Scriptures.

The next annual fair of the State Agricultural Society is to be held at Utica.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

[Compiled for the Recorder.]

Tuesday, Jan. 14.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—A resolution was passed calling upon the Secretary of State for information relative to the amount of the Texas debt, price of Texas scrip, population, quantity of land remaining ungranted, &c. After some unimportant business, the debate on the Annexation of Texas was continued. Holmes of S. C., Morse of La., Brown of Ia., and Davis of Ky., were the speakers.

SENATE.—Communications were received from the Treasury and the War department; a petition was presented from Vermont against the annexation of Texas; another plan for annexing Texas was presented and discussed at length.

Wednesday, Jan. 15.

In the HOUSE, several unimportant bills were presented, after which another plan for annexing Texas was received with roars of laughter. The Texas discussion was renewed, and continued until the House adjourned in great confusion, no quorum being present.

In the SENATE, several petitions were presented and a long executive session held.

Thursday, Jan. 16.

In the HOUSE, Mr. King of New York referred to a report that members of the House had left the city to fight a duel, and moved for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the matter and report a resolution, if need be, to expel such members. This motion was discussed with great warmth by half a dozen members, and was finally laid on the table by a vote of 106 to 82.

Mr. Adams offered a resolution, calling for information relative to the exact boundaries of Texas, and also the treaties existing between that Republic and other nations. The motion passed.

The SENATE held a long executive session, and did nothing else of importance.

Friday, Jan. 17

In the HOUSE, almost the whole day was occupied in considering the supposed defalcation of Mr. C. J. McNulty, Clerk of the House. The subject was brought up by the Chairman of the Committee on Accounts, who submitted a report stating that the Clerk had been twice notified to appear before the Committee, but had refused to obey the summons; that his accounts with the government, connected with the contingent fund of the House, were in a suspicious condition; that $44,000 of the public money had been drawn from the bank of deposit, for which there was only the security of the Clerk's official bond of $20,000, leaving a deficiency of $24,000; and that such official misconduct required a rebuke from the representatives of the people. The report closed with resolutions to dismiss the Clerk and institute inquiries into his affairs. After considerable conversation, a resolution was passed directing the sergeant-at-arms to arrest Mr. McNulty, who was soon taken into custody and brought before the House. The resolutions were again read, whereupon Mr. McNulty made some explanations, asserted his innocence of any disposition to defraud the people, and promised to explain everything as soon as the accounting clerk, who was then absent, should return to the city. Much desultory conversation ensued upon the question whether the Clerk should be held in custody, which was finally decided in the negative. A motion was passed to suspend him from office, and postpone the consideration of the subject till to-morrow.

Saturday, Jan. 18.

The SENATE was not in session.

The HOUSE, in committee of the whole, acted upon several private bills. Mr. McNulty's case was brought up again. Several facts unfavorable to him were stated, in the course of a long conversation. The resolutions of the Committee were then brought up. The first, dismissing the Clerk from his office, was passed unanimously. The second, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to inquire in regard to the money subject to the Clerk's order, was likewise passed nem. con. The third, directing the President to institute prosecutions against all those who had been concerned in this embezzlement, gave rise to a short discussion, but was finally passed with great unanimity.

B. B French, Esq., was then appointed Clerk of the House, and sworn in by the Speaker.

The House soon after adjourned.

NEW JERSEY.—The Message of Governor Haines informs us, that the pecuniary condition of the State is excellent, and that there is no necessity for any further direct taxation. A reform in the School system is demanded. The State Prison is said to be in a good condition; the New Jersey pilots are complimented for their skill and diligence; the Milita system has fallen into great disrepute. In relation to the Plainfield Bank, the Governor says, that having appointed Com missioners to examine into the affairs of the said institution, and they having reported that "upon due examination they were fully satisfied that the said bank was solvent, and that its affairs had been and were judiciously arranged," he does not suppose any further proceedings on his part are judicious or authorized.

NEW JERSEY STATE PRISON.—The number of prisoners in confinement is 158. The discipline has been mild, but salutary—proving, that except in a few extreme cases, moral suasion as a means of reformation is preferable to violence, or severity of punishment.

The earnings of the prisoners exceeded the expenses of their support, $4,709 65. Of this sum, $4,000 were paid into the Treasury, leaving at the close of the year, cash on hand, $2,777 67, together with a large stock of raw materials, coal and provisions, all paid for.

ABOLITIONISTS IN SOUTHERN PRISONS.—Seven persons from the North are now in Southern prisons for assisting Slaves to run away from their masters. Thompson, Work and Burr—formerly students in Dr. Nelson's Mission Institute—are in the Missouri penitentiary under sentence for 12 years; Rev. C. T. Torrey, of Massachusetts, in the penitentiary of Maryland for 6 years; Delia A. Webster, of Ferrisburgh, Vt. in the penitentiary of Kentucky for two years; Jonathan Walker, of Harwich, Mass. in prison in the Territory of Florida for —— years; and a Mr. Boyd in the penitentiary of South Carolina, we believe for 4 years. In addition to these, the Rev. Mr. Fairbank, a Methodist Clergyman, is in jail at Lexington, Ky., awaiting his trial on a charge of the same character.

NOBLE ACT OF GOV. BRIGGS.—Some time in the early part of the present Fall, a poor, unfortunate man, a slave to appetite, was arrested for using profane language,—brought before the Justice, and of course fined; and in default of which he was to be incarcerated sixty days in the House of Correction. Not being able to "raise the wind," he was finally offered release by paying the cost and giving security for good behavior for three months, in the sum of one hundred dollars. He flew around among those who had made him drunk and had been the cause of his misfortunes, but their hearts were steeled. With the "Jug" before his eyes,—family of wife and children depending on him, he met the Governor, and telling him his complaints and his wants, he in the spirit of Washingtonian kindness signed the bonds with the unfortunate man,—saved him from prison,—restored him to his family, and we have not heard of his using the "critter" since. Go the Union over, and you cannot find another instance of a State becoming surety for a man in that condition. Such Governors are scarce, but Massachusetts has the honor of possessing such.

BEGGARY.—A writer in the Tribune gives the following illustration of the means by which beggary is carried on in New York:

A few months since, a clergyman was frequently visited by a female who uniformly brought in her arms an infant clothed in rags, and so poor and emaciated that apparently the little sufferer's existence could not be many days prolonged. To use his own expression, his hand seemed as destitute of flesh as an eagle's claws. After suitable relief had been furnished the little sufferer in the way of clothing, he (the clergyman) while on a visit to a parishioner, was asked to go with the lady of the house to see a living skeleton, in the person of the identical child that had been relieved. He found it in the hands of another mother, and clothed in rags, as when he first saw it. He investigated the matter, and found that the child was starved for the purpose of being used as capital in begging—that four different females used it for this purpose, each using different streets to exhibit in; and all claimed it as their own. They cleared by the operation about six dollars per week.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The following statistics from the "Friend," a temperance paper published at Honolulu, one of the Sandwich Islands, are interesting, coming as they do from a new born nation:

The official value of the yearly consumption of goods is given at $171,565, paying to Government in duties, $5,270 34. Nett revenue of the kingdom in 1843, $50,000. Expenditures, $45,000, Public debt, $30,000. Amount of money in circulation at Honolulu, $50,000. Amount of bills negotiated for supplies to whalers and men-of-war, variously estimated from $137,000 to $200,000. Rate of exchange on Europe and America, from 15 to 20 per cent. Product of sugar about 600 tons; of molasses, 80,000 gallons; of paint oil, 10,000 gallons.

What is now eminently needed at these Islands, is, that devoted laymen, of the different professions and trades, come and settle here on purpose to do good; not with the selfish design of enriching themselves, but with the disinterested intention of benefiting the nation, by teaching the useful arts, industrious habits, and ways of developing the physical resources of civilized life. Such men, with the virtues of economy, prudence, and thrift, could any where get a livelihood, and they could every where do great good.

THE LUTHERAN CHURCH.—According to a statement in the Lutheran Standard, the Lutheran church was introduced into this country in the year 1743, by Rev. M. Muhlenberg, who emigrated from Germany and esablished himself in Pennsylvania. The Lutheran Church in the United States is composed chiefly, but not exclusively, of Germans and their descendants. For a considerable period it was supplied by ministers from the parent country. Its congregations are located in nearly all the States but are principally found in Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Maryland, Virginia, and North and South Carolina. The number of its congregations is about 1,400, and its ministers only about 450.

Connected with the Lutheran Church is the College at Gettysburg, Pa., and four Theological Seminaries, one at Hartwick, N. Y., one at Columbus, Ohio, and one at Lexington, S. C. Four papers, exclusively religious, two in the English and two in the German language, are supported by the denomination. The church is divided into nineteen Synods, which again are divided into Conferences. The General Synod is constituted by representatives, ministers and laymen, from the local Synods. The only Lutheran churches in New England are one in Boston and one in Waldoborough, Maine.

TRUTH STRANGER THAN FICTION.—A poor country girl traveled from Gee Cross, near Manchester, to London, during the troubles in the time of Charles the First, to find a place as servant. Failing in this object of her ambition, she engaged herself as, what was called, tub-woman to a brewer—that is, she carried out the beer from the brew-house. Pleased with her healthy and handsome face, the brewer raised her to the position of his servant—then to that of his wife—finally, to that of a widow, with a handsome dowry. She engaged Mr. Hyde, then celebrated as a clever lawyer, to settle some puzzling money matters for her; and, as his own money matters happened to be not only puzzling, but in a hopeless state just then, he proposed to the rich widow, and married her. Mr. Hyde became Lord Chancellor, and Earl of Clarendon; the only daughter of the marriage being wife of James II. and mother to the Princesses Mary and Ann; and so the poor tub-woman ended her life as Countess of Clarendon, wife to the Lord Chancellor of England, and mother to one, and grandmother to two Queens of England.

WOMAN.—Perhaps a more just or beautiful compliment was never paid to woman than the following from Judge Story:—

To the honor, the eternal honor of the sex, be it said, that, in the path of duty, no sacrifice is with them too high or too dear. Nothing is with them impossible, but to shrink from what love, honor, innocence, and religion require. The voice of pleasure or of power may pass by unheeded, but the voice of affliction never. The chamber of the sick, the pillow of the dying, the vigils of the dead, the altars of religion, never missed the presence or the sympathies of woman. Timid though she be, and so delicate that the winds of heaven may not too roughly visit her, on such occasions she loses all sense of danger, and assumes a preternatural courage which knows not and fears not consequences. Then she displays that undaunted spirit which neither courts difficulties nor evades them; that resignation which utters neither murmurs nor regrets; and that patience in suffering which seems victorious over death itself.

EMPHASIS.—A clergyman, in his early days, denied that grammar or emphasis had any thing to do with pulpit exercises. One day he found his mistake by the laughter created on reading his text: "And he spake to his sons, saying, saddle me, the ass, and they saddled him."

SUMMARY.

It is said that a surgical operation was performed in New York a few days ago, to remove a tumor from the neck of a young woman during a magnetic sleep. It was performed by a young surgeon recently from Paris, in the presence of some of the most distinguished physicians of New York, and was perfectly successful.

The Warren Tragedy seems now likely to be fully revealed. The trial of Peter Parke, indicted as one of the actors in that wholesale butchery, terminated at Belvidere, New Jersey, on Friday, in a verdict of guilty.

"Why don't your father take a newspaper?" said a man to a little urchin whom he caught pilfering his paper from his door step. "He sends me to take it," said the little boy.

We see it gravely stated that 'Blue Dick,' a celebrated racer, has suddenly expired at New Orleans, of the bowel complaint. There are a good many black 'Dicks' in that latitude, who might die impromptu of colic, and receive

The amount yet required to complete Girard College, at Philadelphia, is $408,032. It is expected the whole will be finished in the course of two years.

In Massachusetts the number of State paupers for the year ending 1st of November, 1844, was 6,060; of these 3,688, more than one half, are foreigners.

In St. Louis the number of paupers in the Alms-Houses 68; of these 43 are foreigners, and 25 Americans. During the last four years there have been admitted into the St. Louis Marine Hospital, 1289 foreigners and 530 Americans.

It appears by the Report of the Secretary of the Rhode Island Total Abstinence Society, that the numberof licences in that State has decreased since 1835 from six hund[illegible]d sixty to one hundred and seventy-nine, an[illegible]t fourteen towns have withheld licences altogether.

A bill was passed by the New Hampshire House of Representatives at its late session, abolishing militia trainings except of volunteer companies, and these are to be paid three hundred dollars each per annum for their services. All able bodied persons, however, are to be enrolled every year, and returns made to the Adjutant General.

The accounts of Gov. King, of R. I., have been subjected, according to his own wishes, to a rigid examination, by a committee composed in part of his political opponents, and the result is a balance in his favor of some four hundred dollars, being the amount of various sums discharged by him which, in the pressure of his numerous duties, he omitted to charge to the account of the State.

Miss Dix, who has traveled over the States of Massachusetts and New York, and attentively examined into all the prisons in those two States, has just finished a tour through New Jersey on a similar mission of Philanthrophy.

There are about five hundred schools in Massachusetts where vocal music is now practiced. Half a dozen years ago, the number was probably less than one hundred.

FREE NEGROES IN LOUISIANA.—Thirteen free men of color, who came here on board of vessels from the free States of the Union, were yesterday placed in confinement by the Second Municipality police, in pursuance of the act forbidding free persons of color to come within the limits of the State. Such an impertinent interference with our internal laws as that of which Massachusetts has been guilty, but tends to increase vigilance on the part of our police in these matters. [N. O. JOE SMITH.—An account of the death of the Mormon Prophet has been lately published by a man named Daniels, who gives this remarkable account: When the life of the Prophet was being taken, "a light, so strong, so bright, blazed between him and the corpse, that he and four men who shot him were struck with terror and consternation. Their muskets fell from their hands, and they stood like marble, not having power to move a single limb." "This light was something like a flash of lightning, and was so much brighter than day, that after it had passed, it left a slight darkness like a twilight."

"THE LOVED AND LOST."

"Time hath not power to bear away
Thine image from the heart;
No scene that marks life's onward way
Can bid it hence depart.
Yet while our souls, with anguish riven,
Mourn, loved and lost, for thee,
We raise our tearful eyes to heaven,
And joy that thou art free.

We miss thee from the band so dear
That gathers round our hearth,
We listen still thy voice to hear
Amid our household mirth—
We gaze upon thy vacant chair,
Thy form we seem to see,
We start to find thou art not there,
Yet joy that thou art free.

A thousand old familiar things
Within thy childhood's home,
Speak of the cherished, absent one,
Who never more shall come.
They wake, with mingled bliss and pain,
Fond memories of thee;
But would we call thee back again?
We joy that thou art free!

Amid earth's conflict, woe and fear,
When dark our path appears,
'Tis sweet to know thou canst not share
Our anguish and our tears—
That on thy head no more shall fall
The storms we may not flee;
Yes, safely sheltered from them all,
We joy that thou art free.

For thou hast gained a brighter land,
And death's cold stream is past;
Thine are the joys at God's right hand,
That shall forever last.
A crown is on thine angel brow,
Thine eye the King doth see,
Thy home is with the Seraphs now—
We joy that thou art free!"

THE YOUNG MAN FROM HOME.

The following incident was related by the clergyman to whom it refers, and gives a graphic picture of some of the trials to which a seamen's minister may be subjected.

Shortly after I took charge of the Bethel in this city (O) and before I had really learned the difference between my old and new pastoral obligations, an ill-favored man called at my house with a request that I would attend a funeral immediately. I asked him where? He replied by asking if I was not the Sailors' Minister? I told him I was. "Well," said he, "you need not be afraid to go then where sailors are to be found;" and refused to inform me where my services were needed, but waited as if to guide me thither.

After a moment's reflection I decided to follow him. He led me, as I had feared, to a street noted for the vile character of those who resided there; and I entered, with some misgiving, one of those moral charnel-houses, that usually abound in sea-ports.

A low murmur passed through the room, where were assembled between twenty and thirty sailors, a few reckless bullies, and six wretched women, (if women they might be called,) bloated, haggard, yet seemingly serious. They were ranged around a handsome coffin, in which lay the form of a young girl, certainly not past sixteen, whose countenance gave evidence that she had died a violent death; still there could be traced some remains of beauty in the disfigured face, and my heart melted within me, as I reflected that she, in all probability, had gone into the presence of God a self-murderer. At the side of the coffin sat a young man of genteel appearance, (for though dressed in sailor garb, I saw he was not like the rest who surrounded him,) who seemed almost maddened by sorrow. His eye met mine once—but that look concentred in it, all one could imagine of remorse and terror. Behind him, with her hand upon his shoulder, stood the infernal Hecate who called the house her own, and near her, one of the degraded male wretches she kept in her pay.

I saw all this in far less time than I can narrate it; and inwardly appealing to God, took the seat offered by the man who had brought me to the place.

"Well, parson," said the mistress of the house, "this young thing killed herself last night, and I want to put her under ground decently. There's the billet the coroner gave me—you see all's straight. Now will you just go on and do your duty? This young man wanted you should be sent for, but he don't want you to talk to him."

I took out my Bible, but never was I more puzzled to tell what portion to select; at length I chose one of the Penitential Psalms. After reading it, I made a few remarks on the guilt incurred by such a life, and such a death as this before us, and then I knelt among that miserable throng, (for they all knelt with me,) and prayed for forgiveness for any who might be implicated, in the day of eternity, as accessary in any wise to her fearful doom. I heard the women sob as I pleaded with God to save those whose steps even then "took hold on hell," and the breathing of the men became impeded as I remembered them in my petition. When we arose from our knees, the young man spoken of had fallen forward on the coffin, with his face touching the face of the dead girl, and his tears had bathed her cheek, and moistened her grave-dress.

The old hag raised him up, and whispered a few words to him; his lips became white, his frame convulsed, and he glanced at me with so awful an intensity of expression that I quailed beneath his glance. At that moment a staggering step approached the door, and a man pushed it open and reeled in. Every one remained quiet for an instant, till he staggered up to the coffin and exclaimed, "I must see her once more." At the word, the vile keeper let go her hold of the young man, and springing at him like a tiger, she dealt him a blow in the face, that sent the blood spirting over the coffin, and laid him prostrate on the floor, saying, "I'll have order in my house when the parson's here."

The man who had brought me to the house, tapped me on the shoulder, before I could say a word handed me my Bible and hat, and overcome with what I had seen, I returned to my home.

My wife was ill at the time, so I could not tell her the circumstances, and thus relieve my mind of part of the burden; but I sat late in my study that night, revolving it in my mind. Just as I was about withdrawing, I heard my name spoken by some one in the street. I opened the door cautiously, for the servants had retired, and as I did so, I heard hasty steps departing; but peering out into the darkness, I soon found my hand grasped by some one, and the words "Will you pity and assist me?" mournfully repeated, met my ear. I drew the speaker to the light in my study, (but not until he had conjured me to bolt the door,) and to my surprise found he was the young man I had seen at the funeral.

I began to question him. "Oh," said he, "I will tell you all if you will but promise me your protection."

Said I, "That I will promise, if you was not that girl's murderer."

He shuddered. "Oh, sir, that girl's life was taken by mistake—they meant to have murdered me!" He then related the particulars of the case to me

He said he was the only son of a wealthy merchant in B——, whose father had been won by his importunity to allow him to make one voyage incognito, in a ship belonging to the firm. He left home in the forecastle of the ship ——, bound for O., with about two hundred dollars in gold, gold watch, guard, &c., with sailor-clothes of the finest make, for his go-ashore dress, and suitable apparel for ship-board. On reaching port, he went with some of the sailors cruising about the town in his ordinary dress, but the night before he thought he would dress in his best, and go alone, confident that if he got in a scrape, he had money enough with him to clear himself. He little knew that his money was to cost the life of a young being he had then never seen.

He walked about awhile, pleased with the notice he attracted in his neat sailor garb, but finally turned his steps towards the house his shipmates had spoken of to him previously. He entered, and nearly the first one that spoke to him was the young girl mentioned. They sat down at a table, and conversed some time before he called for drink; but finally he ordered it, and flung a gold piece upon the table in payment. The old woman waited on them, eyeing his watch and chain, (for the girl had lured him to display it,) and as soon as the glasses were emptied, she had them refilled, and then left them to attend to others.

The girl told him to mind and not drink too freely, lest he should be robbed. He said there was no danger of that, for he did not like liquor; and she laughingly changed glasses with him, saying, "If you want more, take mine—I am used to drinking now."

He had observed that his glass seemed higher colored than the one set nearest her, and thought it likely was stronger. As she spoke, she emptied the tumbler, but scarce had done so, when she gave a terrifying scream, and exclaimed, "I am dying!—I am dying!" and shortly after went into convulsions.

The degraded men kept there by the woman, soon cleared the bar-room of all the male inmates but himself. He, horrified at what he saw, and not understanding at the time how it was caused, was engrossed with attending to the wretched being, who was in reality dying before his eyes; but before she died, the keeper of the house told him unless he would stay willingly, till his deposition was taken by the coroner, she would murder him. To this he consented, but in the morning, when the coroner left, he was hindered from leaving by the most diabolical threats. They must have judged from his dress and hands that he was not a sailor, and feared to strip him and turn him out of doors, as they perhaps would have done, had they thought him a friendless stranger, but they were determined to keep him until they could intoxicate and rob him safely. He said when he became convinced that this was their plan, he thought of the Bethel Chaplain of the port, and persuaded himself if he could but have him brought there to attend the funeral, he should be able to appeal to him and be released from the harpy.

It was not until after strong promises on his part, and a bribe of several of his gold pieces, that he succeeded in sending for him; but the agony he felt, caused by some of the remarks made by the minister, the whispered threat, and the confusion caused by the drunken sailor, together with the hasty manner of the minister's departure, all combined to leave the words unspoken that would have made the minister espouse his cause.

When he found himself again alone, without, as he thought, one to whom he could appeal, he became stupified and almost senseless. The sailors one by one left the house, as the pauper hearse bore away the dead; and when he recovered his faculties, he found he was in a room alone, guarded on the outside by the man who had been sent for the minister.

Until past midnight the man held firm against all his bribes and entreaties, but finally he consented, if the young man would leave port with the first ship sailing for B., and while waiting would remain hid with some friend, and take a solemn oath that he would not prosecute;—then he would take him out and set him at liberty. The next question was, where should he go? He had been away from the ship so long, he feared to forfeit his incognita if he returned without being able to tell where he had been detained, if he even escaped being considered a runaway, and dealt with accordingly. At last he told the man to take him to the minister's, and when they got there, begged him to wait and see if he would admit him, "for," said he, incautiously, "there's not a soul in the city whose face I know, but his."

At this, his companion started, and the tone of his voice changed; but they were at the door when he made the assertion, and he repeated the name of the minister to see if he called him rightly. "This was what had drawn my attention," said the Rev. Mr. ——, "and advancing so quickly to the door, prevented any change, (if there was any contemplated,) in the man's proceeding. The next day a vessel sailed for B——, with the penitent youth on board; and the minister had the pleasure of receiving, some weeks later, a letter of thanks from his parents for attentions to their son during his stay in O——, and one from himself, stating that he had deeply repented of the errors of his course, and was trying to lead a new life, thanks to the counsels of the Bethel Chaplain."

PRECOCIOUS CHILDREN.

I will venture to make a suggestion to parents, which is the more important from the fact that selfishness sometimes puts on the guise of virtue, and deceives even those who are concerned in the trick. There are parents who, from the ambition to have their children shine, stimulate them by base excitements to exertion, thus sacrificing the purity of the heart and often the health of the body. There are parents who, from a frivolous vanity, dress their children in an extravagant manner; thus tarnishing the youthful spirit with the same paltry vice which sways themselves. There are some people who are flattered if their children appear precocious, and those usually attempt to make them prodigies.

I once knew a mother who was possessed with this insane ambition in respect to an only child. This was a little boy, of bright intellect, but feeble constitution. There was, by nature, a tendency to premature development of mental faculties, and this dangerous predisposition was seconded by all the art and influence of the mother. The consequence was, that while the boy's head grew rapidly, and at last became enormous, his limbs became shrunken and almost useless. His mind too, advanced, and at the age of eight years he was indeed a prodigy. At ten, he died, and his mother who was a literary lady, performed the task of writing and publishing his biography. In all this, she seemed to imagine that she was actuated by benevolent motives, and never appeared to suspect the truth, plain and obvious to others, that this child was as truly sacrificed by a mother's selfishness to the demon of vanity, as the Hindoo infant, given by its mother to the god of the Ganges, is immolated on the altar of superstition. Let parents beware, then, how they permit their own selfishness, their own vanity or ambition, to lead them into the sacrifice of their children's happiness. Let it be remembered that premature fruit never ripens well, and that precocious children are usually inferior men and women. Parents, therefore, should be afraid of prodigies. Nothing is in worse taste, than for parents to show off their children as remarkable for wit, or indeed, for anything.—Fireside Education.

THOUGHTS FOR PARENTS.

* * * * I feel that I stand on high ground, in decrying the system of children's visiting, when I can cite the authority of Legh Richmond, in confirmation of my views.

'I have ever had strong, very strong objections,' says he, 'to allow my children to visit anywhere, without one of their parents; and through life I have lamented endless evils arising from the want of superintendence, and the absence of those who are most concerned in guarding against the mischief of association with other families. As a general rule, therefore, I have always objected to it, from conscientious motives.'

Still it may be said, a man like Legh Richmond might act as he pleased, but how can we follow his steps? How can we offend our friends and neighbors and connexions, by refusing to let our children visit them, when others have no scruple on the subject? The answer is plain: Did God entrust you with them to train for his glory, and to be the instruments of their eternal salvation; or did he lend them to you, that you might please others, and conform them to the evil habits of an evil world? If the first question is answered in the affirmative, then the rest is obvious. Whatever, on reflection, is found to have a tendency to pervert or injure the mind of a little heir of immortality, is to be avoided, cost what it will.

If a rare and very valuable volume of pictures was left with me by a friend, to be carefully preserved till he called for it again; should I think myself justified in lending it to all my neighbors, and especially to those who I had every reason to believe would soil or rend it, just because if I refused to do so, I should run the risk of displeasing them? Should I not say, I am bound by a higher obligation to my friend than to any other person; the book is his property, not mine, and whilst it is in my keeping I am answerable to him for it. The application is evident; but in this, and in a multitude of things on the all-important subject of education, mothers, instead of asking what ought I to do? ask, what do others do? They soon perceive the evils resulting from such inconsideration, but they do not inquire, Where did the evil begin? how can I prevent it? A river may be diverted from its course, if we place only a few stones in its way, when it first issues from the mountain as a rippling stream; but let us wait till, swelled by numerous tributary currents, it has acquired tremendous force, and is rushing towards the ocean, and the power of man will oppose its progress in vain. And does not this teach us, that the first movements of a child's mind must be watched over with a jealous eye, if we would not have those which tend to evil, strengthen into habits which nothing but a divine power can overcome? We are all so prone to look at things as they are, and so little addicted to searching into the reasons, and sources of their being so, that most of our energy is directed to crush evils, which might have arisen but for this want of vigilance. Believing in the fullest extent the humbling doctrine of man's utter depravity, I do still maintain also to the fullest extent, the belief that a most unlimited promise of success is given to man's agency, rightly directed; God working in him "both to will and to do of his good pleasure."

The indefatigable labors of those who are employed in reforming criminals, in visiting asylums for vice and misery, cannot be too highly extolled; but had the same energy been directed to the prevention of the evil, to the training of children, from their birth, as heirs of glory, to watching with religious care over schools for infants, and to teaching the teachers of others, would not the effect on the world in general, and the actual mass of good accomplished, have been much greater than it now is?

The subject of this letter is indeed, as you remark, 'momentous beyond almost any other,' but it is one so peculiarly suitable for a Lady's Magazine, that I shall perhaps be tempted, in some future numbers, to trouble you with further observations upon it; hoping that by the blessing of God, some mother may be thereby led to feel that their office is no sinecure, and their work not one for time, but for eternity.

Yours respectfully,
M.

THE LOST STAR.

"Like the lost Pleiad, seen no more below."

Reader—hast thou ever, for a brief season, enjoyed the luxury of solitude, far from the din of cities, the hum of business, and the strife of tongues? Hast thou, when night has hung her curtains round, and displayed those countless luminaries that a little child once said were "gimlet holes, to let God's glory shine through," fixed thy attention and gazed long and intensely at the dim lights that cover the Heavens? Hast thou studied these phenomena, with the aids that science affords, till thy soul "ached to think" and instinctively shrinking from farther advances, awe-stricken and overwhelmed by emotions unutterable, sought relief, by sinking, in rapt adoration, upon the bosom of Him 'who built the skies' and rolls the stars along? If thou hast never known this 'solemn feast of feeling'—go and enjoy it for once, and thou wilt not fail to do it again. Well has the sweet singer of Israel exclaimed, "The Heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handy work!" "O Lord! how marvelous are thy works." Suppose a passionate admirer of the sublime and the beautiful, were to-night to ascend some eminence, and for the first time get a full view of the Celestial Hemisphere—would he not respond involuntarily to this sentiment of the Psalmist?

Those familiar with the science of Astronomy are aware that an opinion has obtained that in the constellation called the Pleiades, one star has long since become extinct—also that this supposition has afforded a theme of interest to the Astronomer, the Poet and Philosopher. Various opinions have prevailed as to the cause of its exit, but no clue has been obtained fully satisfying the enquirer. For a long time the star was there—perhaps from the period when the morning stars sang together; but suddenly it was not, the eye sought it in vain. Somewhere within the limits of the universe it was lost. Well—what of this? The tens of thousands, left to glow and burn and make the visible heavens as beautiful as ever, still attract the gaze of mortals, and they perceive and feel no loss. Nor does it at all disturb any who dwell in our Solar System—and it may be that millions of systems, like our own, sustain no such relations to the Pleiades as to cause among them one sigh for the lost one. To all these it was a mere speck—a dim, distant taper, often eclipsed by the beams of nearer and more brilliant luminaries. But were there none by whom its loss was felt! Did not its sister stars that moved around it, shining perhaps with brighter lustre from its reflected light, feel the shock when it was hurled from its orbit and its place left vacant? Were there no intelligences, near or remote, to mourn that the work of the Creator was marred?

"And, is there glory from the Heavens departed
O void unmarked! thy sisters of the sky
Still hold their place on high.
Though from its rank thine orb so long hath started
Thou that no more art seen by mortal eye—
Hath the night lost a gem, the regal night?
She wears her crown of old magnificence,
Though thou art exiled thence—
No desert seems to part those urns of light
Midst the far depths of purple gloom intense."

It has been said, not inappropriately, of some of earth's bright and beautiful objects that

"They've set like stars that fall to rise no more."

We remember in the sunny days of early youth, that a young being often crossed our path on whom Nature had lavished her choicest stores. Beauty intelligence—meekness—sweetness of temper—a confiding and affectionate heart were hers.—Wherever she moved she attracted notice—she appeared among her fellow youth the admired of all admirers—and anticipation painted the future for her in most glowing colors. Suddenly she was missing. Conjecture was busy—facts confirmed its surmises. Like the lost Pleiad she was seen no more in the sister group whose circle she had so long graced, and of which she had been, in an important sense, the life and light. The Spoiler had marked her for his prey, and she had fallen! She lived still, but it was among the "living lost," for there she had resorted to conceal her shame.

And who cared for this ruin? Not the Spoiler for his bands were made strong by conquest—not the cold world, for they regard all such matters as of little moment, unless they come nearer home than the case of a stranger. Their language is—"O it's a common occurrence—let her be forgotten, the sooner the better; there are thousands left, as innocent and as lovely—so many that she will not be missed."—Not the citizens of a foreign country, for they feel no interest in her behalf.—Not her companions in sin, for their hearts have been steeped in crime till they have become callous.—Not the dark spirits in the world of despair, for they know full well to what depths her steps are tending, and hail her near approach to their gloomy caverns.

And are there none who mourn her loss? Yes verily—Her Maker beholds it and is grieved. Work that he pronounced good and on which he bestowed much care, is a wreck. The Redeemer had loved her soul with more than a parent's love. In Gethsemane and on Calvary he remembered it, and there purchased a crown of glory that would have made her shine as a star forever and ever—if she would have secured it, by meeting the most reasonable conditions. Good Angels, who had watched over her when she was innocent, delighting in their unseen offices of love, have bent their pinions heavenward reluctantly bearing the sad tidings to spirit-bands of a loss that must rob heaven of a bright gem, and hide it among the refuse of the Universe.

In the circle she had left, are many eyes red with weeping. But tears cannot restore her, though poured forth like water. Her former associates, though they may blush to speak her name, follow her with yearnings of soul. Her beloved sisters who had been at her side from infancy, and in their childish sports "had filled one home with glee," are mourners that refuse to be comforted—They have been at the funeral of Virtue, a sister has worn the shroud, and been laid in the urn of 'a living death.' Her noble and affectionate brothers, with souls that feel a sister's dishonor as their own, are clad in sackcloth, and did not higher motives restrain them they would bathe the sabre to its hilt, in the blood of the Spoiler. Parents—a Father and a Mother, with love and grief swelling their bosoms, look on their smitten flock—not only participating in their grief, but bearing themselves a double load. Their language is—"Oh my child! my child! would God I had died for thee—" A void is left in their hearts not again to be filled—"sin when it is finished, bringeth forth death—" and the wanderer dies, far from home and kindred, leaving no evidence of repentence unto life. (Would that like the lost Pleiad, hers were a solitary case.)

A soul is lost! and is this an event of little moment?—Is it of less account than the extinction of a star? With the one is connected an existence of more myriads of ages than there are stars in the firmament—the other, for aught we know, may have been annihilated by a breath of the Almighty, leaving its visible loss only to be deplored.

'Tis immortality gives worth to being—
And this alone stamps truth upon the phrase
"A world in purchase for a soul is gain."

VIRTUES AND VICES.

Mankind often boast of their virtues while they wholly overlook the vices of which they are guilty. When the abominable voluptuary and debauchee Louis XV. was on his death bed, and experiencing the miserable tortures of a disease contracted by the habitual infraction of one of the commandments, he labored to appease his conscience by the following reasoning—"I have been a great sinner, doubtless; but I have ever observed Lent with a scrupulous exactitude. I have caused more than one hundred thousand masses to be said for the repose of unhappy souls. I have respected the clergy, and punished the authors of all impious works, so that I flatter myself I have not been a very bad Christian." This is the way with most men. If they have performed a good deed, they consider it as an offset for a thousand vices. Such is the inordinate selfishness and credulity of the human heart, that even where the whole life has been a universal and almost uninterrupted series of moral impurities and defalcations, the casual perpetration of a virtuous act is arrogantly contemplated as an expiation for the whole; and the "Christian" gasping beneath a mountain of sensual crimes and impurities clings fondly to the one act of dubious, perhaps of compulsory virtue, as the gem that redeems the whole.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

THOUGHTS ON THE PERPETUITY OF THE SABBATH.

NUMBER FOURTEEN.

No Apostolic Authority for a Change of the Sabbath Time.

So long as I was an observer of the first day for a Sabbath, I relied much upon apostolic example as authority for that practice, believing that the apostles were accustomed to assemble on that day with the primitive churches, for common worship, and to celebrate the Lord's Supper. This, I believe, is the common support of all observers of the first day, who plead holy Scripture for that practice. No reasoning upon the subject appears to me more inconclusive now; for if we except the meeting of the ten disciples on the first evening after the resurrection of Christ—recorded Luke 24: 36 to 43, when they met to take their evening repast, and Jesus met with them—there is only the single passage, Acts 20: 7, that speaks of an assembly on the first day of the week. But the observance of the Sabbath was as follows: Down to the time of Peter's vision at Joppa, Acts 10, in which he was instructed that God had removed the distinction between things clean and unclean, the disciples had preached the word of the Lord to none but Jews only, Acts 11: 19, i. e. to Jews and proselytes to Judaism, Acts 2: 10—such as the Eunuch of Ethiopia, Acts 8: 27. So far were they from teaching or supposing that the Sabbath law was annulled, or changed, that down to this time they had not even been taught that the laws which made it an offence for a Jew to eat with a Gentile were abolished! This was one of the "all things" which the Holy Spirit, promised in John 14: 26, was to teach them. So that to this time they had strictly regarded the laws of Moses, not only in Judea, where they might have been afraid of the Jewish authorities, if they had disregarded the Sabbath; but also in Antioch, the capital of Syria; and the island of Cyprus; and at Phenice, in the island of Crete—places far distant from Judea—they pursued the same uniform practice, for seven years after the resurrection, according to the common chronolgoy. If then the Sabbath law was abolished or changed, it must have been by the Holy Spirit after that time.

It may be asked, if the apostles did not preach the abrogation or change of any Mosaic laws, why were the Jews so exasperated with them? To this I reply, they preached Jesus Christ, the Ruler and Mediator of God's people—see Acts 2: 22 to 36—consequently, this must do away the Aaronic priesthood and the law of sacrifices; and it was this that made the high-priest and all that were of his kindred, so angry with Jesus of Nazareth, John 18: 19—with his apostles, Acts 4: 6; for they preached the remission of sins in his name, without the appointed sacrifices of the Mosaic law; yea, farther, that by faith in his name men were justified from all sins—a blessing which the Mosaic law of sacrifices could never impart to the worshipers thereof. Compare Acts 13: 39 with Heb. 9: 13 and 14. This was surely enough to exasperate the high-priest and all that were of his kindred! These facts considered together, show plainly, that neither the Messiah nor the Holy Spirit had taught the apostles that all the laws of Moses were abrogated at the death of Christ, but that certain laws and institutions which had been enjoined for a time had now received their accomplishment and passed away by the coming of those more glorious things of which they had been the shadows. Their design, like the ministry of John the Baptist, was accomplished, and the substance which they prefigured being come, now required the faith and regard which had once been given to them.

Let us inquire, then, did the Holy Spirit, at this or any other subsequent time, annul or change the Sabbath law? That the question of changing or annulling laws was entertained, yea, thoroughly discussed, at that time; and that the apostles did not pretend to dispense with any law which had been of divine appointment, without first obtaining the mind of the Holy Spirit respecting it by direct revelation; is proven by Acts 11: 1 to 17, and Acts 15: 1 to 31. Was then the Sabbath among the former institutions abrogated or changed by the Holy Spirit?

1. That it was not, I argue from the absence of any repealing or changing precept or instruction contained in the sacred Scriptures.

2. From the fact that in four cities of the Gentiles, where the apostles preached the Gospel to Gentiles as much as Jews, we are expressly told that they assembled and worshiped on the Sabbath, and in the synagogues of the Jews. At Antioch in Pisidia, first in the synagogue to Jews and Gentile proselytes, and the next Sabbath by special request to the Gentiles particularly, when nearly the whole city came together to hear them, Acts 13: 14 to 44. At Philippi, a chief city of Macedonia, Acts 16: 13. At Thessalonica, likewise a city of Macedonia, Acts 17: 2. And at Corinth in Greece. These last three being European cities, there could be no fear or constraint of Jewish laws.

3. It is proven that there was no change of the Sabbath law or time by the Holy Spirit, because the Apostles and primitive Christians, both Jews and Gentiles, uniformly kept the Sabbath according to the law. The instances mentioned above were not occasional conformities with the Jewish customs for the sake of preaching the Gospel to Jews, as is sometimes alledged; but the result of a constant obedience to the divine law. Let us take the Apostle's course at Corinth for an example. Acts 18: 2 to 4, says, that while in that city, for his own support and to save the cause from unjust aspersions, he labored with Aquila and Priscilla at tent making; but every Sabbath day, he preached to Jews and Greeks; and verse 11, says, he continued there a year and six months! This was from the middle of the year 53 to the close of 54. It could not have been an accommodation to Jewish prejudices, for when the unbelieving Jews opposed and blasphemed, he removed his meetings to the house of Justus, a Roman name, and many of the Corinthians believed and were baptized, verses 7 and 8. When Paul left Corinth, he went to Jerusalem; from thence to Antioch; after which he visited the churches all over the country of Galatia and Phrygia; and from thence coming to Ephesus, he abode there two years; towards the close of which time, he wrote the first Epistle to the Corinthians, (see chap. 16: 8.) In that Epistle, he four times affirms that the things which he had taught them, he had taught alike in all other churches of the saints. (See 2 Cor. 4: 17; 7: 17; 14: 13; 16: 1.) If, then, the Apostle and the church at Corinth kept the Sabbath for a year and six months, all other churches of the saints were taught to do so likewise.

4. There is but one instance mentioned of an assembly being held by the Apostle of the Gentiles upon the first day of the week—Acts 20: 7. This meeting at Troas was an evening meeting, and continued until midnight. At this stage of the meeting they were interrupted, by Eutychus being overcome with sleep, falling out of the window, and being taken up dead, for Paul went down and restored him. After this the breaking of bread took place, and Paul and his friends continued the interview, eating and talking until break of day, when Paul departed on foot to take ship at Assos. The reader will please observe, that the word day in the text, is in italics, indicating that it is not in the original Greek. If, then, Luke reckoned time as all other sacred writers do, this meeting was immediately after the close of the Sabbath, so that Paul and his company who sailed from Assos with him, treated the first day as a common working day; for as soon as it was light Paul went on foot from Troas to Assos; from whence they immediately sailed on a considerable voyage. This appears the plainer from the fact that it was a farewell, a parting meeting;—they expected to see Paul no more. See Acts 20: 25. Farther, that this was not considered sacred time is manifest, because Sopater of Berea; and of the Thessalonians, Aristarchus and Secundus; and Gaius of Derbe; and Timothy of Lystra; Tychicus and Trophimus of Asia; and Luke the historian, Paul's companions in travel, Acts 20: 4, sailed from Troas to Assos, while Paul staid at Troas and held a parting meeting with his former friends. And Paul himself had made these arrangements, minding himself to go on foot to Assos, the distance being much less by land than by sea. This was the occasion of his leaving his cloak, and books, and parchments, with Carpus; which several years afterward he directed Timothy to bring with him, when he was about to visit the Apostle at Rome, Timothy being then at Ephesus. See 2 Tim. 4: 13.

Lastly, it is plain that this was a social meeting between Paul and his affectionate friends, and narrated chiefly to show the miraculous restoration of Eutychus from the dead by Paul embracing him. If it had been the celebration of the Lord's Supper, would Paul's eight companions mentioned above, have left before the meeting closed? Would Paul and his friends have continued eating and talking even to break of day. This meeting at Troas on the first day of the week, when considered in all its circumstances, is no better example for the sanctification of the first day, than the meeting of Jesus with his disciples when seven of them were fishing at the sea of Tiberias is for sanctifying that day.

5. There is no evidence that the church collections which Paul directed should be made at Corinth, and throughout Galatia and Macedonia, were in any instance taken in a public assembly, convened for worship; and consequently they can afford no evidence of a regular observance of the first day of the week as a religious day. These church contributions began at Antioch in Syria; were voluntary contributions, which each disciple determined to make for the benefit of poor saints who dwelt in Judea; and were occasioned by the afflictions they endured in a time of famine and persecution, Acts 11: 29. They were afterward extended to the churches of Galatia, Achaia, and Macedonia, and were inculcated by James, Peter and John, as by Paul and Barnabas, Gal. 2: 10.

1. That they were not taken in public assemblies convened for public worship, is plainly shown by the fact that at Antioch it was not a church act, but the spontaneous contribution of benevolent individuals, each man, according to his ability, sending his gift by the hands of Barnabas and Saul. At Corinth and throughout all Achaia, every one was to lay by himself, against the time the Apostle should visit them to receive their gifts; no public treasury or collection is named. 2 Cor. 16: 1 to 4.

2. They were not, at Corinth, expected to choose the receiver of these gifts until the Apostle himself came, verse 3.

3. They were not even standing weekly collections; for the Apostle says, "that there be no gatherings when I come," 2 Cor. 16: 2; and the Corinthians informed Paul that they had prepared their gift a year before he came to receive it, 2 Cor. 9: 2 to 5. It was a special effort for a special occasion.

4. I see no probability that they were all monied contributions. They were for poor saints, and might consist in part of clothing, or even other necessaries; for we find the good women of those times so employed in good works, making garments for the poor. Acts 9: 36 to 39. And this is the more probable, as in every instance mentioned these gifts were sent by the hands of special messengers.

On the whole, there is nothing in apostolic authority or example, on which a consistent Bible Christian can hang a first day Sabbath. All the stated weekly seasons for public worship, as mentioned in the New Testament, were held on the seventh day weekly Sabbath—the day which the Jews then kept—the same which Jews, and "they who keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus," now keep.

A CONVERTED ISRAELITE.

The following circumstances connected with the conversion of a Jew to Christianity, were stated by Rev. Mr. Tucker at a meeting for the purpose of forming a Baptist Society to promote Christianity among the Jews. They appeared first in the Christian Watchman.

"He is a native of Breslau, and his parents are persons of wealth and influence in the Jewish community. Some years ago he left his home for England, and after remaining there for some time, he sailed for America, and neglected to inform his parents. His father came to England in search of him, but was informed that he had sailed for home, and the latter having heard that a vessel had been lost about that time, gave him up for lost. So strong was the affection of his mother for him, that she was taken sick in consequence of the supposed loss of her son, and has continued in a feeble state of health ever since. Upon his conversion to Christianity he immediately wrote home, and has since received from that mother a long and affectionate reply. It seems that she was sick in bed, sinking under her affliction, and her mother's heart yearning over her poor lost boy. At length, a letter arrives. Upon being told it is from her son, she faints and continues insensible for some time. In the mean time a grown up daughter reads it, and is alarmed and thunderstruck with the news that her brother had renounced the religion of his fathers and become a Christian. The sister is so overwhelmed with terror and alarm, that she can scarce maintain her composure, supposing that the dreadful intelligence will at once bring down the gray hairs of her mother with sorrow to the grave. At length the mother revives, and with the greatest composure says she is now ready to hear the letter from her long-lost boy. The daughter proceeds, but fearful of the consequences, in the present weak state of her mother, omits that portion giving an account of his conversion. The watchful eye of the mother, fixed upon the countenance of the daughter, notices the omission, and says—"My daughter, you have not read the whole of that letter; do not deceive me; let me hear it all; I am now calm and composed, I have heard from my son and he is yet alive, and I am prepared for any thing." The daughter then read the whole, but instead of that fearful emotion she anticipated at the dreadful intelligence, the mother continued calm and silent to the close and a little after, and then, what think you was her remark? Wiping the tear that started from her eye, she said—"Well, I am not surprised. I have thought ever since he was a boy, that he would one day burst the bonds that bound him!"

The mother immediately revived, and wrote to her son a beautiful and affectionate letter in Hebrew, which, said Mr. T., I have seen, and heard translated, and from it, I have no doubt, that for years that mother has been a believer in Jesus as the Messiah, "but secretly for fear of the Jews."

USEFULNESS.

Barnes, in his practical sermons, which are full of truth and beauty, says that it is the little rivulet that glides through the meadow, and that runs along day and night by the farmhouse, that is useful, rather than the swollen flood, or the noisy cataract. He then describes the majesty and glory of Niagara; but one Niagara is enough for a continent—or a world; while the same world needs thousands and tens of thousands of silvery fountains, and gently-flowing rivulets, that shall water every farm, and meadow, and garden, and that shall flow on every day and night with their gentle and quiet beauty. So we admire the great deeds of Howard's benevolence, and wish that all men were like him. We revere the names of the illustrious martyrs. We honor the man who will throw himself in the 'imminent deadly breach,' and save his country—and such men and such deeds we must have when the occasion calls for them. But all men are not to be useful in this way—any more than all waters are to rush by us in angry floods. We are to be useful in more limited spheres. We are to cultivate the gentle charities of life. We are to benefit those around us—though like the gentle rivulet we may attract little attention, and may soon cease to be remembered on earth.

Such sentiments as these cannot be too much admired, nor such truths too deeply imbedded in the heart of the church. None are so humble that they may not be useful. And they who are faithful in little are as carefully noted and richly rewarded, as they who are entrusted with much.

THE PERILS OF THE SEA.

Address before the N. Y. Mariners' Family Industrial Society.

BY REV. JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.

No one can have visited freely among the families of seamen, without receiving a very vivid impression of the peculiar sorrows to which they are exposed. During a recent residence of two years upon the Island of Nantucket, I was continually witnessing scenes which would excite the deepest sensibilities of any heart. There were not less than a hundred ladies in my congregation, whose husbands were mates of ships. Once a month we observed the concert of prayer for seamen, which was habitually attended by from five to seven hundred persons. And in that great congregation there would be hardly one individual who had not some near relative on the ocean.

It has often been my melancholy privilege to weep with the widow and the orphan in the freshness of their anguish, as the tidings came that the husband and father had been buried in the sea. But a few months ago, I was passing from the Island of Nantucket to New Bedford, in the steamboat. One of my parishioners was with me. He had just bid adieu to his wife and three young children, as lovely a family as can be found in New England, and was on his way to take command of a ship, on a voyage of three or four years 'round Cape Horn. The tear stood in his eye, and his lip trembled with emotion, as he alluded to the weary months and years which must elapse ere he could again enter his happy home. A few weeks ago his family received the intelligence of his death. In the midst of the Pacific, they had struck a whale. The wounded animal, in his endeavor to escape, shattered the boat in fragments. A portion of the line to which the harpoon was attached, became entangled about the person of the captain, and as the whale plunged down, with lightning speed, into that fathomless sea, he was carried to a depth from which his body never can arise till at the archangel's summons, the sea shall give up the dead that are in it. But who can tell the pangs which must rend the heart of the wife and the mother, as, with feeble health and limited resources, she presses her orphan children to her bosom. There are multitudes of such families to be found every year in this city. And to such families the visitors of this Society can go with words of consolation.

A few months ago, a sea captain and his wife came to this city. And here in sorrow and tears they separated. He embarked for Germany, there to take charge of a whale ship for a long three years' cruise in the Pacific. And she, with a heavy heart, returned to her solitary home, there to await the lapse of months and years, till her husband should recross the waves to his family. The husband arrived safely at Hamburg, and in letters full of affection informed his wife, that he sailed from there in his usual health, and with encouraging prospects.

A few more weeks passed away, and the tidings came that he was dead. Three days from land he suddenly sickened and died, and his body was consigned to a watery grave. And the weeping widow now sits in her darkened chamber, refusing to be comforted. There are many such widows in this great city. They are unknown. They are friendless. They are in poverty. And with aching heads and aching hearts, they are longing for the repose of the grave. But the visitors of this Society, with the heart of sympathy and the hand of help, can present them the only remaining solace which earth can afford.
